Those details could finally come to light Wednesday, when Hamilton County Prosecutor Joe Deters is expected to release the video recorded by Tensing's body camera. Like Cincinnati itself for the turmoil likely to follow the release, DuBose's family focused on remembering their loved one. Who was Sam DuBose exactly? For his family and friends, he was a lot of things. As an angry community demanded the release of the video, DuBose's family said their final goodbyes to him on Tuesday, as hundreds gathered for his funeral service at the Church of the Living God in Cincinnati. According to the Cincinnati Enquirer, the scene inside the church was in stark contrast to the which manifests ites outside. Reverend Ennis Tait, who did the funeral service, told the Room: Despite all the things going on outside — we're not going to dismiss it — but for a few minutes we're going to celebrate the life of Samuel DuBose.Dominee Tait, then asked the crowd to help fill this house with love. It wasn't a difficult task, as DuBose's friends and family thought back to the man he was. DuBose, who was 43 at the time of his death, was a music producer and aspiring rapper who was very close to his family. The second eldest of five children, DuBose, was the eldest of his siblings, and even though he was often a troublemaker, his mother, Audrey, loved him unconditionally. She told the congregation during the service: He loved life. He loved freedom. He was impossible. But he brought me such joy. As much exacerbate as he brought, he brought joy... I loved my son, God knows I loved my son. DuBose also had a large family of his own. He was the father of 10 children and a grandfather to four grandchildren. According to CNN's Cincinnati affiliate WKRC, DuBose was on his way to watch a movie with his nine-year-old son, also named Samuel, when he was pulled over and killed. The younger Samuel told the news outlet: He came home that night and we had a projector so we went to watch a movie on it, but we didn't get it ... because he died. And to his friends, he was a passionate leader and founder of the Ruthless Riders motorcycle club, promoting a riding community to which DuBose had been close for years. Al Jenkins, a club member, described DuBose as Big Dude, which even on your worst day is going to make you smile. Russell DuBose, a cousin, echoed that sentiment, saying to the Cincinnati Enquirer: He was just an overall good person with a big heart. If I had a bad day, he was always able to turn it around. He was a joker. LaLaura Beautiful Goodwin, another member of the motorcycle club, speaking to Cincinnati's WLWT News, said she worries about the public's perception of her friend: What makes people so angry is we know him. The public doesn't know him. You know, all of a sudden they were going to assume he was a certain kind of person. Because he's black, African-American ... so they found certain perceptions behind it. But actually he was a very nice, sweet person and he loved his family. It was his gentle nature that some family members have questioning the events surrounding the arrest. DuBose's first cousin, Ebony Johnson, told the Cincinnati Enquirer that there was no way DuBose could have fought against a police officer:I'd like to know what happened. He was meek and gentle and so peaceful. There's no way he could struggle and fight. While the city anxiously waits for the release of the much-caught video, DuBose family had one request. Reverend Tait told WLWT on behalf of the family: They don't want the city turned upside down and that issue should go on brother's life. Jack Pearson has always had a great deal of emphasis on family on family on This Is Us, and most assumed that it was because he wasn't a big one growing up. His father was an abusive alcoholic, and his mother couldn't really be there for him because of the abuse she endured, too. Not the best way for a child to live, but Jack found Rebecca and they made a family of their own. But in the Oct. 24 episode of This Is Us, the cat fell out of pocket — Jack wasn't an only child. He has a brother, Nicky. But since we didn't see him as an adult, does that mean Jack's brother Nicky is dead on this is us? Onlookers met Nicky in a flashback of Jack in the car, waiting for his father to fish the two of them. Unfortunately, Mr Stanley Pearson decided he was mature thirsty and stopped in the pub on his way to the lake, and Jack couldn't do anything but repeat for himself the hope that his father would (eventually) come back. Towards the end of the scene, a head appears in the back seat, and Jack assures his spectacular little brother, Nicky, that their father is coming back and that he will never leave him alone. Don't worry, Nicky. I'm not going anywhere, I'm not going anywhere, he says. Cue the tears. Later, Jack, in the 1990s, finds and gently holds up a photo of Nicky and Jack in Vietnam. They should have been deployed or entered together, but it doesn't look like both Pearson guys necessarily made it back. The question remains — did Nicky die in battle? Or are he and Jack just estranged from each other? Jack's insistence that his sons get along makes sure it looks like Nicky is no longer alive and that he is wistful for that brother relationship. In the Season 1 finale, Moonshadow, Jack is 28, back from Vietnam, and even more angry with his father than he was before. Though it can only be part of growing up and realizing that Stanley is a negligent, abusive jerk, Jack could also hate his father because Nicky went to war and didn't come back and now all Jack for family is his problematic parents. There's also another tragic option for Nicky's fate. In Moonshadow,Jack tells a neighbor that he was only a mechanic while in Vietnam, but in the second episode of Season 2, viewers gave a glimpse of Jack jumping out of a helicopter with an M-16. Because it's us, all these details need to be connected, and that leads to another question — is Jack somehow responsible for Nicky's death? Friendly fire is unfortunately a thing. However, it's us, and maybe a big twist is coming that will reveal Nicky is still alive and was only estranged from Jack for unknown reasons. Whether it's in the present day or in flashbacks, I doubt we're done seeing Nicky. This is our producer John Fequa told Entertainment Weekly that Jack's traumas are related to the on which he family and children. He said: The big thing is he keeps secrets, that he compartmentalized and hid this part of his life, which was obviously his brother, and that was a big deal. Obviously, a big thing happened, a trauma of some sort. And that's what Kevin does. That's what we're trying to say with this episode. This life of keeping secrets and evasion is exactly the kind of behavior that Kevin exhibits. We're trying to draw the parallels between the good and the bad of Jack, and how it manifests itself in his kids. Jack knows the value of being a brother (or brother in general), and he could feel how he feels about keeping his family together because he knows that it can all be taken away in an instant. This could lead to the idea that Jack's bad side is the one partly responsible for his brother's death. Whatever happened to Nicky is on This Is Us, he's had an immeasurable effect on Jack's life. The first season of You really blew up as soon as it made its way to Netflix and set Twitter on fire. So it's no wonder that Season 2, which was picked up by the streaming site, was as highly anticipated as it was. If you know how the first season ended, you know that Joe got back in a lot of messes in New York City that led to kidnapping, his infamous glass boxing and some murders. As a result, he started in Los Angeles... and still spilled into the same type. But can a dead character actually spell the end to Joe's lifestyle? Possible. Spoilers for your season 2 forward. Penn Badgley is Joe Goldberg in Netflix's 'YOU' | Tyler Golden/Netflix Joe's relationship with Love Quinn put many people at risk, including Forty Quinn To Recap quickly, Joe was fascinated with Beck in Season 1 and could maneuver his way into her life, making himself the perfect boyfriend. When he was in fact, he stalked her to the point where he could let situations go in his favor. But they weren't well matched and she wasn't the perfect girl he created in his head. As a result, she drifted from Joe, causing him to turn his murderous tendencies on her. With Beck dead, Dr. Nicky framed for her death, and Candace on Joe's tail, he moved to LA and started a brand new life. He obviously falls in love with Love Quinn and starts stealing his obsessive again. Although he matches equally this time because Love also has some murderous secrets. Because of Joe's relationship with Love, innocent people like Delliah and her little sister Ellie are affected. Not to mention, Forty Quinn (Love's brother) dies when he finds out Joe's whereabouts. Forty was working on a script about Beck's death and knew Joe had done it forty is an aspiring screenwriter and though he had a lot of misses, all it takes is a good story to get started. He doesn't have a muse, not, when he finds Beck's post-humorist novel, he decides that's the script he wants to adapt. This results in Forty Joe stealing away and locking them in a hotel room until they complete the script. There are drugs and hilarious travel scenes involved, but basically, Forty made a breakthrough with the script. He's looking for Dr. Nicky in prison and pieces together what Joe did. This results in him confronting Joe and Love at Anavrin with a gun, leading to his death because Officer Fincher came in at the scene. Did he leave his movie — and his findings — to someone else to expose Joe? So, Forty are gone who gets rid of one more person who knows Joe's a killer. What if, though, he left his script to someone? Elite Daily explains a theory that Forty's script could bring Joe down. Ellie is forced to flee to Florida, but she knew that script was fine. And now that she has something against Joe, could she piece together what Forty did? If Forty finished the script with the point of view of the boyfriend killing Beck, that would be bad news for Joe. Even if Ellie doesn't connect that it's Joe as the killer boyfriend, people will see the movie will help them piece it together. Forty and Joe speak after their massive night of writing and rolling, 'YOU' | Tyler Golden/Netflix Beck was well liked and had a friend group made up of well-connected people. Even if Peach is gone, if Annika or Lynn saw the movie, they'd see that Joe is the obsessive boyfriend in the script. And if Forty finished it to the point where it was obvious the boyfriend (aka Joe) killed Beck, they would quickly disseal that information. It's a pretty solid theory that would give Joe the comepace he deserves. And with the series guaranteed another season, it might just happen. Happens.
