He is the author of several books, including culturally diverse counseling: theory and practice, overcoming racism and understanding abnormal behavior. Sue was born in Portland, Oregon to a Chinese family. His family lived in a wealthy, predominantly white neighborhood with his parents, four brothers and one sister. He remembers being teased because of his ethnicity in early childhood [4] For Sue, discrimination and prejudice made him feel like an outcast and he often asked his brothers for support to go through these difficult times. Sue and his brothers often discussed what it means to be Chinese living in America. They talked about the hostility of the invalidating society and how damaging these consequences were to their self-esteem and standard of living. Although prejudice and discrimination had a negative impact on Sue's image, it increased his interest in multiculturalism. Later, he was influenced by his studies in intercultural counselling. Two of the people who influenced Sue's graduation path were Malcolm X and Martin Luther King, Jr.[3] The family married his wife Pauline in the 1960s. They have two children, Derald Paul and Marissa. Derald Wing Sue was a biology major at Oregon State University when he took psychology classes and became fascinated with what he learned. He switched to psychology and loved the classes he took, but at one point he began to rebel and question teachings that did not seem to fit his own experiences. He believed that theories in counseling and psychotherapy were related to class and culture. Sue earned a bachelor's degree from Oregon State University and then a Ph.D. in psychology from the University of Oregon. In 1965, Sue was exposed to the Humanities by Leona Elizabeth Tyler, former president of the American Psychological Society. Sue considered academic presence important, but the curriculum was invalid because race and culture were rarely discussed other than superficial or intellectual. After graduating, he became an advisor at the University of California, Berkeley, and was known as an advisor who supported students from Asian America. During his time at Berkeley, he conducted mental health research on Asian Americans, which led him to co-author two books: The Theory of Multicultural Counseling and Therapy and Abnormal Understanding. In 1972, Sue and his psychologist brother Stanley Sue co-founded the Asian American Psychological Association due to a lack of mental health research in Asian America. Sue was the founder of the organization. In 1981, Sue published counseling the Culturally Diverse: Theory and Practice. This book has become a lightning rod for controversy because of its philosophy of multicultural advice. The text contains amendments to sue's previous writings published on advice barriers, the credibility of advisers and worldviews on counselling. In addition, the text underlines the understanding of the socio-political nature of social justice advice and advice. [10] There is also a chapter Critical Incidents in Intercultural Counseling aimed at highlighting and illustrating the key issues/concerns/decision points that may arise in several intercultural advisory situations that affect people from different cultural/racial backgrounds. Sue became a professor because of his willingness to teach and disseminate his ideas and awareness of multiculturalism. As a professor, he tried to create an intercultural counselling class and tried to combine cultural concepts in all the courses he taught, although he received backlash from students and faculty who believed that regardless of cultural differences, good counseling was good advice. His disciples found his teachings suspicious, defiant and politically correct. They asked him to focus solely on race and ethnicity in counseling. Sue responded to his students, and with each course he taught, he developed more detailed theories and practices. Sue called on his students to commit to understanding multicultural counseling and become proactive in their techniques. However, they also received backlash from lecturers and colleagues who found that their behavior was unprofessional. Aware of the problems his students had, he encouraged them to seek allies and supporters for their multicultural advisory case. In addition to being a professor of psychology at Teachers College, in 1996 he sat on President Bill Clinton's Advisory Council on Psychology. He was president of the Society for the Psychological Study of Ethnic Minority Issues and president of the Society for the Psychology of Counseling of the American Psychological Society. Together with Melb J. T. Vasquez and Rosie Bingham, he co-founded the National Multicultural Conference and Summit in 1999. He has written more than 150 publications on various topics such as multicultural counselling and psychotherapy, the psychology of racism and anti-racism, cultural diversity, cultural competence and multicultural organisational development[3], but in particular multicultural competence and the concept of micro-aggression. He earned a Doctorate from the University of Oregon and served as a lecturer in the Institute for Management Studies and Columbia University Executive Training Programs. He was co-founder and first president of the Asian American Psychological Association, former presidents of the Society for the Psychological Study of Ethnic Minority Issues (Division 45) and the Society of Counseling Psychology (Division 17). Dr. Sue is a member of the American Counseling Association, fellows of the American Psychological Association, the American Psychological Society, and the American Association of Applied and Preventive Psychology. Dr. Sue served as staff editor and journal guide (now journal for counseling and development), is an associate editor of an American psychologist, A member of the Asian Journal of Counselling and has been or continues to be a consulting editor for many magazines and publications. Derald Wing Sue can really be described as a pioneer in the fields of multicultural psychology, multicultural education, multicultural counseling and therapy, and the psychology of racism/anti-racism. He did extensive multicultural research and writing in psychology and education long before the academic community perceived positively, and his theories and concepts paved the way for a generation of younger scholars interested in minority mental health issues and multicultural psychology. He is the author of more than 150 publications, 15 books and numerous media productions. In all these endeavors, his commitment to multiculturalism was obvious, and his contribution forced the field to seriously challenge the monocultural knowledge base of its theories and practices. As evidence of his professional influence, Dr. Sue's book, CULTURALLY DIVERSE ADVICE: THEORY AND PRACTICE, 2008, 5th Edition (with David Sue – John Wiley & Sons Publishers), was considered the most cited publication in the field of multiculturalism; Since the first edition, it has been recognized as a classic and used by almost 50% of the psychology market advising graduates. With the help of many colleagues, he chaired the committees of the Society for Counselling Psychology and the Association for Multicultural Counseling and Development, which resulted in laying the foundations for the movement of cultural competences in providing mental health services to an increasingly diverse population. Because of his personal experience of life-changing racism directed toward his family, Dr. Sue's research gradually turned to the psychology of racism and anti-racism. When he was invited to address President Clinton's Race Advisory Board at the National Dialogue on race and attend a Congressional Briefing on the Psychology of Racism and the Myth of color-blind Society, Dr. Sue realized that white invisibility and ethnocentric monoculturalism were harmful not only to people of color, but also to Whites. These experiences and actions resulted in his critically acclaimed book OVERCOMING OUR RACISM: A JOURNEY TO LIBERATION, 2003 (Jossey Bass Publishers). Written primarily for the general public, he directly confronted White Americans with their white privilege, innate prejudices, and their unintended oppression of people of color. As expected, the book aroused intense feelings and provoked difficult dialogues about race. These reactions led Dr. Sue and his research team at Teachers College to undertake a 6-year study on the causes, symptoms and effects of racial microaggressions. Their groundbreaking work resulted in a soonomic of racial microaggressions that empowers people of color invisible, visible, by validating their experiential realities and providing them with a language describing their experiences. Dr. Sue is currently expanding microadression research to include religion, gender, disability, sexual orientation and other marginalized groups. Contrary to the belief of most White Americans that microaggressions create minimal harm, his research suggests that these daily attacks and insults are responsible for creating inequalities in education, employment and health care and producing emotional anxiety in the People of Color. His latest book, MICROAGGRESSIONS IN EVERYDAY LIFE: RACE, GENDER and Sexual Orientation (John Wiley and Sons Publishers), has already aroused a lot of excitement. Dr. Sue's services have been widely sought after by many groups and organizations. He has also conducted extensive cultural diversity training for many Fortune 500 companies, higher education institutions, business, industry, government, public schools, and mental health organizations. In this capacity, Dr. Sue has worked with mental health practitioners, university faculties, teachers, students, community leaders, senior executives, and middle-level managers. His work is recognized not only at national level, but also internationally. Dr. Sue has presented and traveled in Asia (China, Hong Kong, Japan, Taiwan, Macau, philippines and Singapore), New Zealand and Europe. He is often sought after as a spokesman for issues of racism, multiculturalism and diversity by the press and other media. Dr. Sue has been interviewed in many television specials and is often quoted in the press. In recognition of his outstanding contributions, Dr. Sue has won many awards from professional organizations, educational institutions and community groups. He was honored by the Association for Multicultural Counseling and Development with the Professional Development Award and research award; by the Asian American Psychological Association with leadership award, distinguished contributions award and president's award; by the Association of Third World Advisors with leadership and distinguished contributions to the Cross Cultural Theory Award; by The Society for the Psychological Study of Ethnic Minority Issues with mentoring and leadership award; by the Center for the Study of Teaching and Learning Diversity with diversity in teaching and learning lifetime achievement award; by the California Psychological Association with the Distinguished Scientific Achievement to Psychology Award; by the American Counseling Association with the Professional Development Award; by the Society of Psychology Counseling, Sage Publications and Psychologist Counseling for Outstanding Publication 2001; by California State University, Hayward, Alliant University and Teachers College, University for Outstanding Lecturers or Teaching Awards; by the American Psychological Association with the Award for Professional Contribution to Education and Training and the Presidential Quote for Outstanding Service; by the National Multicultural Conference and the Dalmas A. Taylor Prize Summit; by the University of Oregon with outstanding alumnus award, by the American Psychological Foundations with the Rosalee G. Weiss Outstanding Psychologist Award, by the Society for the Psychological Study of Ethnic Minority Issues with Lifetime Achievement Award, and by the Los Angeles County Psychological Association for the Distinguished Service to the Profession of Psychology Award. As evidence of Dr. Sue's attitude in this field, a national study by Fordham University of multicultural publications and scholars found that, impressively, Derald Wing Sue is undoubtedly the most influential multicultural scholar in the United States.
