Download OS X: We showed you how to download subtitles for movie files on your computer through services such as Opensubtitles or Subscene, but subtitles for Mac makes the process as easy as dragging and deleting a video file. Once you open the app, just drag the video to the clapperboard. Assuming that the file name closely matches the name of a famous movie, subtitles will automatically request the Opensubtitles database and upload the corresponding .srt file to the same catalog as the video file. He does nothing magical; You can find the same files yourself if you want to without too much trouble, but it will save you a lot of time if you update a large video library. If you want to play video through XBMC or VLC, you're good to go, but you can also use Handbrake, as described in our guide for embedding subtitles in a video file to view on other devices. Subtitles (free) Website developer through MacStories Knowing multiple subtitles download sites can improve how you like movies and TV shows. Subtitles serve many purposes, and not only for the content of a foreign language that is not duplicated. Subtitles are great for clarity of dialogue, especially during action sequences, where loud sounds can drown out what the characters say. Subtitles are also useful for shows with ensemble casts (seeing names can help with tracking characters), shows with a heavy accent, and shows with plenty of terminology like sci-fi, fantasy and routines. Still wondering where you can get subtitles? We'll tell you the best places to download subtitles for movies or TV shows, as well as how to download them. Subscene fast, comprehensively, and always up to date with subtitles for the latest movie movies Television episodes. All subtitles are created and downloaded by users, which means that you can often find matches even for obscure titles. Podzhen has a simple and simple interface. The subtitles are arranged according to the shows and movies, so all you have to do is enter the show or the title of the movie in the search bar and choose the right one from the results. Almost all Subscene subtitles are in SRT format. You can install a search filter to limit results to specific languages (up to three), and you can decide whether you want to include subtitles with hearing impairments (for sound effects). You can also find forums to be an excellent feature. There you can request subtitles for shows and movies—perhaps there are no in your native language or not that are properly synchronized for your media version. OpenSubtitles has a good selection of subtitles. Users download their own subtitles, while others can rate the quality of subtitles. This ensures that you can check the rating and only download the best. There's one key reason why OpenSubtitles is so popular: it's the largest subtitle base with support for dozens of languages. If you manage to find your way around the site, you will see that there are subtitles here that don't exist anywhere else. Other useful features include a special query subtitles page, surprisingly in-depth advanced search filters, built-in third-party information (such as IMDb details), and relevant links that show where you can buy or stream free movies. YIFY Subtitles has a huge, ever-expanding list of subtitles for movies and movies. It's really easy to browse thanks to its sleek interface that features a promotional poster, year of release, director, and other handy information. You can filter by loads of languages, so you only see entries that have subtitles for your needs. You can also just look for the name of the movie or show. The only downside is that some entries don't have subtitles, so your search can bring back the result, but you'll leave empty-handed. However, YIFY subtitles remain a great and easy way to download subtitles. 4. Podnapisi Despite sounding like a site for podcasts, Podnapisi is an excellent resource for almost 60,000 movies and 7,000 television shows. Chances are all you need subtitles for is available here. Aside from these staggering numbers, there are over 2 million subtitles that have been presented in various languages and formats, including 100,000 that have been adapted for hard of hearing and hard of hearing (SDH) viewers. With a fast, clean interface and easy search function (keyword filter, seasons, language, FPS and more), Podnapisi is a great choice for subtitles. 5. Although the interface isn't the most quirky, Addic7ed is still a great place to get subtitles because of its breadth of content. New subtitles are downloaded all The easiest way to find what you need is to use the search bar. In addition, you can see a list of all the TV shows and movies that they have subtitles available for. If something is not available, jump into the forums and someone may be able to help you. Alternatively, you can browse their tutorials to learn how to make subtitles yourself. Despite its name, TVs are not just for TV shows. It also has subtitles for loads of movies old and new. Of course, TV shows are his bread and butter, and you only need to take a look at their list of subtitles to see why. There are so many TV shows listed here covering decades and genres. The choice of movie subtitles is thinner, so you're better off with another site for those, but some are available if you need them. Most free media players will automatically detect and download subtitle files until you headline them correctly. What does the correct name mean? For the most part, all you have to do is copy the exact name of the movie file or TV video file and paste it as a subtitle file. This works for almost all video file formats (e.g. AVI, MKV, MP4) and the most common subtitle file formats (e.g. SCC, SRT, SUB, VTT). You should also make sure that both the video file and the subtitle file are in the same place. Then start the video file, and your media player should automatically download the subtitle file. And if you don't? Or what if your video file has a built-in subtitle track and you want to override it with a subtitle file? In this case, you'll have to manually download the subtitle file and switch the track to the media player. We will demonstrate the use of VLC, the most popular media player in the world. For manually downloading a subtitle file, even one that is not in the same place as the video file: Run the video file in VLC. In the subtitle menu, click Add the subtitle file. Go to the subtitle file, select it and click Open. To go to subtitles that are different from the built-in subtitle tracks in some video files: Run a video file in VLC. In the Subtitles menu, go to the subtitles of The Track. You can download multiple subtitle tracks (as much as you want) and switch between them at will. This is especially useful for some movie files, especially in MKV format, which come with many subtitles in different languages. The above sites are great. However, if you prefer subtitles for everything, then downloading them manually each time can become cumbersome. Fortunately, a few free media players support the ability to search and download subtitles directly in the app, and some may even automatically find subtitles based on the file name of what you're watching. B. Player: Built-in support for subtitles automatic download, available in both the Free and Pro versions. It is unclear which sites they source. Media Player Classic: Built-in to automatically download subtitles. By default, they come from open subtitles. VLC Player (with VLSub addon): You can search for open subtitles and upload matches to current videos, either by name or by hash (the latter is more accurate). No longer works with VLC 2.1.x, requires vLC series 2.2.x. PotPlayer: You can search for subtitles in the player and download those of your choice. You can add your own source sites if you want. This works just as well when viewed with mobile video player apps. Even if your video player of choice doesn't support the automatic download of subtitles, it's likely to support automatically downloading subtitles to match file names. What Bing Watch Next?
