PMID: 29510146 Background Information: Guidelines recommend routine antibiotic prophylaxis for patients undergoing endoscopic ultrasonography under the guidance of a thin needle aspiration (EUS-FNA) pancreatic cyst, but there is conflicting evidence of its necessity. We investigated whether the antimicrobial prevention procedure increases the incidence of infection. Methods: We conducted a multicenter, randomized, slurred study to compare prevention with ciprofloxacin against placebo in patients with pancreatic cyst requiring EUS-FNA at several centers in Spain. From September 2014 to June 2018, patients were randomly assigned to groups that received prevention with ciprofloxacin (n No. 112) or saline solution (n No. 114, placebo). We recorded patient demographics, lesions and procedures data and monitored patients for 21 days. A total of 205 patients completed the study (90.7%), receiving ciprofloxacin or control, with no statistically significant differences in demographics, baseline data or characteristics of procedures between groups. occurred in a patient in the placebo group (0.87%); This patient developed acute pancreatitis and bacteremia after the procedure. P 1.00) or other adverse events. Conclusions: In a randomized trial of patients undergoing EUS-FNA to assess pancreatic cysts, we found that the risk of infection would be low. The incidence of infections did not differ significantly against the prevention of ciprofloxacin. (ClinicalTrials.gov, number: NCT02261896).
