Real time 2020 premiere

The 19th real-time season with Bill Maher will bow at 10 p.m p.m. on Friday, January 15. The political talk show is available on HBO and streams on HBO Max. It also offers a rerun at 12:30 a.m. after its debut. HBO for non-entrepreneurs, Maher offers his unique perspective on current issues during an opening monologue, roundtable discussions with panelists, and interviews with guests. Maher appeared in his first network special in 1989 and has starred in 11 HBO solo specials so far. Executive producers include Bill Maher, Sheila Griffiths, Mark Gurevich, Dean Johnsen and Billy Martin. Co-producer is Chris Kelly, with producer Matt Wood; Director Paul Casey. Powered by Reelgood Ure House Nancy Pelosi has been commissioned as the show's top guest for Friday (January 17, 2020) hbo's 18th real-time season premiere with Bill Maher (a show our president claims to watch by mistake) and the timing couldn't be more perfect. Pelosi announced yesterday that the impeachment clauses against Donald Trump will arrive in the Senate next week. The series, which has also stirred controversy and turned into late-night political commerce over the years, is being recorded in Los Angeles and broadcast live at 10 p.m. EST. Pelosi, who was first elected to Congress in 1987, has been leading House Democrats since 2004, according to Deadline. She is the first Speaker of the House of Representatives, making her the highest-ranking official ever elected in U.S. history and currently third in line for president (after Mike Pence). Trump has made it clear that he is not a fan of Pelosi and has argued that she is the Democratic face of impeachment proceedings. On Thursday, Pelosi held the hammering in a House vote to approve the war powers' decision, with the sole aim of taking control of Congress and denying the Trump administration's military powers after recent attacks on Iran. Trump wasn't as enthusiastic about it, as you can imagine, and even to Twitter to express his disapproval: Hoping that all House Republicans would vote against crazy Nancy Pelosi's war powers decision. Also, remember its speed and speed by pointing to the impeachment scam. Well, she never sent the articles to the Senate. Just another democratic fraud. Presidential harassment! — Donald J. Trump (@realDonaldTrump) January 9, 2020 Friday's episode of Real Time with Bill Maher will also include a mid-program interview with Democratic presidential candidate Andrew Young, whose campaign cornerstone is a universal basic income payment of $1,000 a month for every American - a freedom dividend aimed at compensating workers for the decline in job availability due to technological automation. The show's panelists will also include Jo Walsh, Cara And John Meacham. Last season, Maher ended his finale with a few words about his approach to American politics. In his remarks, Maher argued that a storm was approaching America, but expressed a desire to manipulate his comedy more towards a helpful joke and less toward insulting the president and his associates. According to Maher, I learned that anti-intellectualism on the right doesn't come primarily because of stupidity, it comes from hatred. Telling people that you think they have no regulation is what makes them say, You know what, I'd rather side with Russia than you. Much like his previous politically incorrect series on Comedy Central and later on ABC, in real time a panel of guests discussing current events in politics and media appears. Unlike the previous show, guests are generally more familiar with the subject: more experts like journalists, professors and politicians participate on the panel, and fewer actors and celebrities are included. Real Time is a weekly hour-long show with a studio audience, broadcast live on Friday nights at 10 p.m. ET. It originated at Studio 33 (Studio Bob Barker) on CBS Tv City in Los Angeles. In addition, a 10- to 15-minute overtime segment quickly follows the show on YouTube (Live Streams), which answers questions posted by viewers through HBO's online website for the show. During the COVID-19 epidemic, real time with Bill Maher moved from Studio 33 to being taped from Maher's home in Hollywood with guests now appearing remotely rather than in person as of the April 3 episode, 2020. Bill Maher and his production team returned to their regular studio on Friday August 28, 2020, their first show Back in the studio since March 2020. Production changes were made to return to the studio, without a live studio audience, continued use of a fake laugh track and archive clips of audiences claps and laughs during Maher's opening monologue, along with the team's social disengagement and interviews with guests via internet/satellite connections. [3] The show's 18th season premiered on January 19, 2020. In September 2020, HBO announced that the show had been renewed for two more seasons, which would keep the show on the air until 2022. The show's 19th season premiered on January 15, 2021. The format of the show usually includes opening current events or a political skit, followed by the credits and a comic monologue. Maher interviews an important character via satellite or in the studio before sitting down with panel guests for a wide-ranging discussion. In the middle of the panel session, Maher does a comic skit that usually satias up-to-date news items. Following the comedy segment, Maher interviews another character via satellite or in the studio. The format changes, with two or three people in the panel. Maher explains that the format is not rigid and that they prefer live interviews to satellite interviews. Toward the end of each episode, Maher has a section called New Rules that serves as a humorous editorial on American culture and politics. [7] The last new law entered Maher's closing editorial monologue. Because the show airs on HBO, participants don't have to limit their language to match the broadcast standards that existed on Politic-Not. Also, images displayed in new rules sometimes include nudity or esoterate images. In season one, Paul P. Tompkins appeared as a reporter. Also, each episode would have ended with a performance by a stand-up comedian, none of whom were political satirists. The segments starring Tompkins and comedians were canceled after the 10th episode. Viewers were also able to enter the show live in the first season and ask questions on air, but that too was canceled. As of February 67, 2006, audio-only episodes became available as a free podcast through the iTunes Store[8] and as a raw RSS feed. The podcasts also include material that was broken from the show but recorded during a return to the studio, including new rules that were not broadcast in the final version. During the fall of 2006, Maher began hosting live chat (now called overtime) on the HBO website following each broadcast, usually including some of the guests on the show. Viewers are invited to submit questions before and during the original broadcast for Maher and guests to answer and discuss afterwards. It is also available on the show's YouTube channel. [11] Opening sequence begins with a spoken phrase from the speech clock (now defunct) in Los Angeles, which includes Joan Daniels as the time sign says good afternoon. The title track was composed by Christopher Kidd Reid and his voice is heard saying Start the Clock, Real Time and Bill Maher. A montage of historical events from the beginning of time to election night on November 4, 2008, accompanies the music along with a crawl at the bottom detailing guests for that night's show. According to HBO, the show averaged 4 million viewers per week in 2014 and 2015. [13] Ratings for 2019 published below were higher in the range of 1.5 million viewers. Politics and current events Bill Maher in 2007 was a critic of the Obama administration, the Bush administration and the Trump administration. His panel is trying to present a broad set of opinions. It is often made up of a liberal commentator or political figure, a conservative commentator or a political figure, and a third person who has no clear ideological label, or someone with moderate beliefs. This third person is often an actor, comedian, musician or other entertainment figure, though often the commentator is openly conservative or liberal. In his previous television series, Politico, he used the word libertarian to describe his political leanings. About religion, he considers himself a rationalist, preaching the gospel of 'I don't know'. Maher identifies himself as politically unrecognizable and disagrees with the Republican Party on many issues, and with the Democratic Party on many of the planks of their party platform. He supported the candidacy of Ralph Nayerder of the Green Party in the 2000 U.S. presidential campaign. After the 2000 election, Maher was among those who felt that progressive votes for Nader may have cost Democratic nominee Al Gore the election, bringing in George W. Bush. During an episode in which Nader and Michael Moore were guests, both Maher and Moore begged Nader not to run again in 2004 (Season 2, Episode 11). He endorsed Democratic presidential candidate John Kerry ahead of the 2004 presidential election. In 2008, he endorsed Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama and sharply criticized Republican candidate John McCain's political campaign. He also sharply criticized the election of Vice President McCain, Sarah Palin, for her skills and intelligence. Maher then interviewed the presidential candidate, Republican Ron Paul, and gave him some positive airtime. He often cites Paul's views to demonstrate the diversity of opinions on the right. [Editing] Maher external links have strong views on U.S. drug policy, which supports the legalization of marijuana. He opposes censorship, often citing his dismissal from the ABC and the opposition against the Dixie Chixies for their comments about the Iraq War. He also opposes conservative attitudes towards sex and sexuality, mocking About the Clinton-Lewinsky scandal and Janet Jackson's wardrobe malfunction. Nor is he ashamed of his lack of religious beliefs and often criticizes religion. He is known for supporting animal rights groups such as PETA. Hot political issues such as health care, corporate influence in government, illegal immigration, the environment, entitlement programs and human service regulations are often discussed in the program. [Editing] External Links Christine O'Donnell On September 17, 2010, Maher likened a clip of Delaware's Republican senatorial candidate, Christine O'Donnell, from October 29, 1999, an episode of his previous television series Politically Incorrect,[16] where she discussed having tampered with witchcraft. It was perhaps O'Donnell's most controversial statements that made her the most covered candidate in the 2010 midterm election cycle. O'Donnell went on to shoot a contradictory commercial claiming I wasn't a witch, I was you. Many video parodies inspired many video parodies[19][20] and O'Donnell later said that the coming back and attention was focused on her decades-old statement. O'Donnell lost to her Democratic opponent, Chris Kuhn, in the general election. On September 7, 2012, the real-time episode with Bill Maher, O'Donnell appeared on the show for the first time and solved the problem with Maher, who apologized for the amount of publicity the Sipp had amassed. Maher said he wouldn't have broadcast the video if he'd known it would have taken the message of her campaign. [22] Changes in 2008 this section does not cite any sources. (August 2018) (Learn how and when to remove this template message) The icbreaker used in the middle of the show (usually a sketch of counterfeit products for equality at the current event) was also cancelled due to the strike. The announcement that real-time would return without writers indicated that the opening monologue would also be cut, but each episode included a full monologue. [Editing] external links during the strike, the overtime idea became part of the live show itself, using a new segment called Blogga, Please!. Through the HBO website, viewers were able to leave comments or questions during the live show. Maher and the panel then responded to selected publications at the end of the show. Blogga, Please! Discontinued, and new rules reinstated, on February 15 following the strike decision. Additionally, during Maher himself recorded pre-recorded interviews with ordinary people about the election and other issues after the opening monologue. [Edit] External Links The last new rule, established early on, was used as a goa for the closing monologue. In the March 7 episode, the closing monologue returned to the format of the series. The opening madrans did not reappear, except on April 4 and 11, 2008. [Editing] External links Instead of doing a second satellite interview near 40 minutes, the January 11 episode also included the real-time reporter's debut, Blogger or Political Pandit, which is brought halfway through the program as an additional panel to express views on the recent events of the election campaign. Such writings included Matt Taibbi, Frank Lenz, Amy Holmes, PJ O'Rourke and Dan Sauge. [Editing] External links Changes in 2009 The 2009 premiere was february 20 at an earlier time of 22:00 EST. The opening sequence also changed somewhat and will include then-President-elect Barack Obama and his family waving to a crowd of supporters on election night in November 2008. The show also aired one consecutive season, as opposed to the spring and fall TV episodes with a summer vacation in between. For a short time, the panel was reduced in real time from three panel members to two for the new season. Maher jokingly attributed the new lineup to the financial crisis, noting that it was a means to curb spending for the HBO show: Maher later stated that there was no connection between the failing economy and the producers' decision to depose the third guest. During his appearance on March 13, 2009, Maher responded to the confusion he made from his previous show about the panel he wrote: I said as a joke that we radicated the panel to two people because of economic times, and people took me seriously. Not. It's only because I'm tired of talking to three people sometimes. The panel was again on three panel members for the show a week later, on March 20. In addition to redesigning the panel, Maher led a one-on-one studio interview segment instead of the satellite interviews of recent seasons. The interview with James Carville on the show on May 8, however, was conducted via satellite. The changes in 2012 resumed on April 24, 2012, for two more seasons from 2013 to 2014. The first episode of Season 11 aired on January 18, 2013, and maintained the format of Maher's initial monologue, a one-on-one interview with a guest, then addressed a three-guest debate panel, ending with new rules. A new addition to the format is that of the fourth or middle guest, who comes about the halfway point of the show, brings their subject to the table and discusses it with the entire panel. [25] Changes in 2017, in 2017, on Real Time, debuted a new theme song. New The song continues in his predecessor's footsteps by presenting major political events, including the election of Donald Trump to the 45th President of the United States. The new season retained the basic format of the show - a guest from the top-of-the-show, a discussion on the table and a guest in the middle of the show. The biggest change in terms of set design was that the main table where Bill Maher and two or three guests discuss current political events is delivered closer to the audience after the top of the show interview is complete. In addition, several guests in the middle of the show including Lya Remini, Jake Tapper, Ralph Reed and Barbra Streisand were interviewed on a separate side table. Although guests in the middle of the show like Remini and Taffer did not participate in any discussions on the main show after their interview or appear in overtime, the segment airing on YouTube, other guests like Reed.
