As your high school year draws to a close, you've probably been encouraged to think about what you're going to do after graduation. There's no denying that you have a wide range of options in front of you, from higher education to business school to just take some time off to get real work experience. Attending the university is a popular option for most of today's students. However, if you're in the state of Florida, you need to do a little more to go to college than just finishing high school. The Floridian government understands that college and high school are significantly different in terms of academic demand. That's why, to ensure incoming students are adequately prepared, the majority of Floridian school districts are required to require their students to take the PERT exam. Like the SAT, the PERT exam will be administered to you prior to your graduation. The formatting of each of these sections of the PERT exam is also similar to what you have experienced through other standardized tests.
