One of the biggest impacts on society today is social media. This affects us both positively and negatively. Social media was originally designed for people to share interesting facets of their lives with their friends, but it has become so much more than what it was going to be. It is now information from around the world. In many cases, people first learn about current events through Twitter or Facebook before hearing about them from traditional news sources. We also rely on technology for almost everything we do. Nowadays, it seems that people can't go anywhere or do anything without smartphones, tablets or laptops. They must continuously come into contact with others through electronic devices. However, there is also a downside to being too connected to social media and electronic devices. We depend too much on them, which makes us oblivious to what we do to ourselves. Too much involvement can have a negative impact on our lives and society as a whole. Here are 9 true illustrations that show how our society has been negatively affected because of the use of technology. 1. Facebook eats away at your time. How much time do you usually spend each day on Facebook or other social networking sites? Does this hinder your productivity? Do you find yourself wasting time to the point where you don't even know where it's going? If the answer is yes, Facebook may have eaten away at its time. 2. We have become Likeaholics. When you're posting something on Facebook, are you doing it just to see how many of your friends give it the proverbial thumbs up? This illustration shows that some people treating the likes of Facebook as if it were the drug they needed injections into their bloodstream. 3. Our electronics are more important in our lives. Given the choice of your dying phone battery or you die, what do you choose? In this case, the man in this drawing decided to charge his phone over in order to preserve his life. As a society, we need to be more careful about our priorities. 4. Families do not spend quality time together. Here's a mom who makes holiday cookies, but what do kids do? They don't make cookies with their mother. Instead, each of them has their own faces buried in their electronic devices. Television was what parents used to watch over their children. Now it's a tablet, phone, laptop or video game that works.5. We'd rather save someone than help them. There's a lot going on in this drawing. A black man drowns and asks for help. One person has a gun pointed at him. Another person has his iPhone pointed at him and is recording the scene, but is not interested in helping this man. Society sleeps, he sleeps his life. Time is money. After we have spent a long time on social media, we are losing the most valuable currency we have – our time in this world. 7. Despite all the technology we have, we still want what someone else has. There's an old saying that says, Grass is always greener on the other side. This illustration shows that, despite everything we have, we are still not happy with our lives. 8. still sells. With the information overload that exists today, the media still looks sensational. There's a woman here who feels she has something important to say, but the media only cares about her because she's naked. Would the media still have microphones in front of him if he wasn't standing there topless?9. In the end, with all this, we're still killing the planet. This latest example claims that despite all our technological gains, we are still polluting the earth as if we had a virtual weapon aimed at Mother Nature. If we build bigger cities and higher technology, how many losses can we continue before we put our lives in danger? Tatiana Ayazo/rd.com, ShutterstockLetting out a giant belching post-meal in China and Taiwan would be seen as the highest form of compliment, but not as if you were dining in Victoria in England. They'd be shocked if you let out even the richest burping. In fact, it could mean social ruin. And don't even think about having one rip, any form of passing gas would go beyond social redemption. These are rude manners that are actually polite in other countries. Tatiana Ayazo/rd.com, ShutterstockCrop tops and sweatpants were certainly not dinner attire back during Queen Victoria's reign. Dressing meals remained very much a ritual of the upper class even after his death in 1901. Of course, it took a job to get ready to eat like a lady or a gentleman. No servant or butler worthy of their salt would let them show up like a vagabond. Tatiana Ayazo ShutterstockAddi, girls! If you were a woman of the Victorian era, jewelry and fancy gifts were an unacceptable overture to a special someone. That was especially true when you weren't engaged or related. According to Victoria-era.org and etiquette expert from 1870 to 1890, Professor Thomas E. Hill, there was only four points a lady could accept as a gentleman without causing a stir: books, confectionery, flowers or notes. Because the flowers and food were perishable, they left no obligation to the lady who received them. Maybe the books and sheet music got a pass when they occupy their minds and thus provided a distraction from the thinking beau. Even today there are certain gifts that can send the wrong message. If you couldn't get any more piece of it on your spork, you would be ready, no matter how much you wanted to lap it up. Here's how to eat properly in the restaurant. Tatiana Ayazo/rd.com, ShutterstockNew wealth, was trickled in cities during the Victorian era and led to the burgeoning middle class telling the BBC. Hiring a maid became a sign of respect, even for the lower middle class. But they could only afford one servant, so she'd be the servant of all the work. According to Victorian author Mrs Beeton, in the book Household Management, the maid's whole work was disparaging. All the work of a public servant or maid is perhaps the only one in her class who deserves to be candied. His life is lonely, and in some places his work has never been done. With increased specialization and developments in surgery and hospital building, many people had a higher chance of surviving the disease. In particular, these were medical breakthroughs in anesthetics. Even Queen Victoria took chloroform for the birth of her son in 1853. It helped people believe more in institutions such as hospitals and helped develop special work houses and shelters for the most vulnerable members of society. Tatiana Ayazo/rd.com, ShutterstockGirls tours are all the rage today. Hanging out with your besties and reading the perfect holiday book can't beat. If your hosts ask you to belt out the tune you should accommodate him, right? But it wasn't an option over 150 years ago. One etiquette book from the time notes that when a gentleman was invited to sing and felt confident enough that his entertainment would be a joy, he had to complete an immediate request. Eating immensely is disgusting; but if you eat too sparingly, your host may think you despise his fare. Not only would the hostess be very aware of what you ate and how you ate it, but she may be offended by what you didn't eat. Considering the Victorian hostess probably didn't make the meal, one must give her credit for the feeling that is needed to protect her chef or her choice of menu. And if you don't like anything, swallow and smile; Spitting it on your plate would be a travesty. Tatiana Ayazo/rd.com, Shutterstock's caring for a man may offend a modern woman, but a Victorian gentleman had a duty when she came to dinner with gals. When they arrived at the dining room before entering, the woman dropped her hand, the gentleman passed through, waited for the woman to pass him, and then he would point to the designated place at the table. The gentleman also did not sit on his own until every woman invited was to sit down. But his work was far from over. She was keeping an eye on her escort lady and ensuring that she was well helped. He had to raise and change his plate, give him bread, salt and butter, give him orders to the waiter, and pay attention to him in all his power. Tatiana Ayazo/rd.com, Shutterstock. A polite nod to the head between gentlemen, a hand gesture or a touch of hat was the equivalent of screaming what's going on with the guy? Some gentlemen bowed to admit to a casual acquaintance, but it didn't float with people you were better acquainted with. But the bow would always come back, even the enemy. Tatiana Ayazo/rd.com, ShutterstockBack era corsets and ccholine, the ladies were heavily covered everywhere but by their ears. They didn't consider as a well-bred gentleman ever cursed or even discussed rude topics when the ladies were present. Today we know that women can dish it out as well as they can take it, but sometimes it's refreshing to have a man who doesn't use the four-letter word for every second sentence if it's one of those four cases, if it's OK for the curse. Tatiana Ayazo/rd.com, ShutterstockNo sure what the boys of the 1800s did irk Queen Victoria, but there were many rules for a gentleman to remember when he didn't want to see exhibiting vulgar behavior. Here's a list of the basics of how to treat a lady in Victorian style: Stand as a lady enters the room. Stand by when the lady stands. If no other place is available, offer the lady your seat. Help the lady with a chair when she's sitting or standing. Especially at the table. Bring the fallen items to the lady. Open the doors to the lady. Help the lady with her coat, cape or scarf. Offer to take women's snacks when they are available. Offer your hand to escort the lady (with whom you are familiar) or from there to the building or space for all social events, and when walking to an uneven spot. Tatiana Ayazo rd.com, ShutterstockEver let your husband leave the house, that's what it looks like? He should have sent you a selfie. In fact, the first selfie was actually taken by this man in 1839. Manual etiquette gentlemen from 1857 this advice was given: A gentleman, while dancing with a lady, should pay almost exclusive attention to him; and at the end of the dance, ask him to make snacks. It was definitely considered vulgar to be ogling other women when your girl was around. Tatiana Ayazo/rd.com, ShutterstockWhen Julia Louis Dreyfuss kicks up her heels or thumbs up for her Elaine dance on Seinfeld we all enjoyed a good chuckle. In Hints of Etiquette and Practices Society with A Glance at Bad Habits, 1844, you were warned byAnce quietly; neither kick and caper about, nor sway body and fro; dance only the hips down; and lead the lady as lightly if you do something whose spirit is gossamer. It wasn't much better if you were a man according to etiquette gentlemen; or short rules and debates about the behavior of society since 1847: No man should try to dance without well-acquainted figures; because of his flaws place a woman who makes him honor to dance with her, in an embarrassing situation, and she makes a rather different figure to what she is going to do. No touching below the belt was definitely a thing-like was putting your hands somewhere they didn't belong or couldn't see. If the lady waltzes with you, beware of pressing her waist; you must only touch it lightly with your palm, so that you will not only give an unpleasant impression not only of his death, but also to his mind, says 1860. According howstuffworks.com, it was a way to announce your presence and arrange visits to keep old acquaintances. The receiver will usually return in favor of the form of the card or visit within a week. (Intimate friends could call immediately without waiting for the card.) It would also normally leave cards in the household during certain events, such as illnesses or commitments, to express sympathy or congratulations. A very nice lady walked in her carriage with a legman who brought the cards to the house. And he'd bring a lot. One married woman calling another would bring one card with her own name and two with her husband's name (for both a mistress and a master) in addition to marital single daughters or cards for household guests. The names of the guest's single daughters can be written on the mother's card. These are the technology and phone etiquette rules you should follow every day. Tatiana Ayazo rd.com, ShutterstockDon don't expect your next date to score you tickets to showcase Broadway when she asks you to show. But when a gentleman invited a lady to the theatre in Victorian days and she said yes, she had to secure the best places within her means. Of course, it was after sending him a written invitation no later than the day before the entertainment, written by a third party, a white note-paper with the best quality matching envelope boot. (Sounds like a lot of work!) And said the lady was then expected to send her reply immediately, so if she could not agree, the gentleman may secure another companion. And do it again. Tatiana Ayazo/rd.com, ShutterstockTo use hair accessories such as combs and hairpieces, luscious long locks were what was fashionable for women back in the days of Queen Victoria. Forget about those hairs dying. Victorian women's hair wasn't the point. Except having your lady's maiden trim ends off the splits, no one messed up with a cascade of long tresses. But it was also the right label for women to always wear their hair up when in the privacy of the bed chamber. Tatiana Ayazo/rd.com, ShutterstockA small flower arrangement of fragrant herbs and flowers, tussie mussie was originally created with outrageous smells of smelly people and poor sanitary conditions. The allure of this aromatic nosegay (aka, a small bunch of flowers) became associated with the tongue of the flowers, which became all the rage Victorian times. Nosegay was the first to use Old Bailey lawyers to fend off germs from defendants. The fad quickly caught on and soon everyone was donning this tussie mussie. They say Lady Mary Wortley Montague used a secret code in her flowers to deliver messages. Soon encrypted messages, often between would-be lovers, avoided strict social identity days and hid within an accepted label while wearing or wearing small bouquets of flowers. Recently it was Kate Middleton who wore a bridal bouquet in the style of a Victoria tussie mussie. And some that we should bring back like Never Let Your Parents Bring You a Chair and Never Allow Them to Get One For Themselves. Wait for them, instead of waiting. Tatiana Ayazo/rd.com, ShutterstockHubpages.com notes another fine point on Victorian etiquette was how a gentleman should smell. As the boys try to impress the gal today, pouring a bottle of cologne on yourself is not the way to do it if you are not trying to stifle him. Men take note of this advice, which has been a test of time: A gentleman should be seen and not smelled. They should use, but a little perfume too much is very bad taste.
