The bottom half of the concern concerns the audio files themselves. From there you can choose which one you want to use and store them in a Slaylist of types. The top part consists mostly of mirrored controls. There are two virtual vinyl batteries and associated controls, while at the very top there is a visual track mix with a beat detector. To start doing anything you need to load songs by dragging them from the bottom of the desired bridge. Once loaded you can start playing them. Clicking on the track will skip directly at this time and dragging on the disc will slowly roll the track forward or backward associated by the well-known noise. The vertical slider next to the track disc speed, measured at bat per minute (BPM). You can designate cup points to remember and configure a loop interval among other things. There is also a crosses that are used to increase the volume of one track while reducing the volume on the other. That doesn't do much with one streak. Loading a second and the players together will ramp up the possibilities however. Mixing tracks so that one seems to evolve into another means that you need to get a specific moment to start a transition as well as synchronize the BPM so that you can keep the rhythm. Finding trains compatible with this campers while trying some more interpolation can be fun and can probably make you want to further explore this avenue.
