Instagram releases a version of 3.0 of its photo app today, and it improves the browsing experience in several important ways. The boldest new feature is called Photo Maps. All the photos you geotagged before posting them on Instagram? Photo The map collects them and pins them on an interactive map of the world. This is by no means a revolutionary interface application from Foursquare to Yelp offering something similar, and even iPhoto allows you to sort images by location. But by automatically creating photo albums that you can see from friends, Instagram has put a new twist on this feature. Cards are switched off by default, making them a privacy-friendly option. When you activate it, you can select individual photos that make and don't appear on the map, and even edit your preferences later. Photo cards are available through the user's profile page, making it easy for friends to see each other's favorite stomping grounds. You can see our trigger-happy social media editor Anjali Mullany pictures from all over Manhattan in her Photo View Map below. Photo Map AM Combined with this, my photo map is rare because I tend to geotag just some of the Instagram photos I take. Photo The Subs! map is not alone, it turns out. According to the New York Times, no more than 25 percent of Instagram users geotagging their photos. This update looks like an offer to get Instagrammers geotag more often in the future. A treasure trove of mobile location data can prove very valuable to a startup that was acquired by Facebook in April. There are a few other new tricks in the Instagram update today. The download screen has a large text box, making it easier to write signatures. No need to press the download button anymore, the app now offers endless scrolling that loads as you go. And to better combat spam and abuse, individual comments can be reported and deleted in one action. When Fast Company was ranked as the most creative person in the business in 2011, he said, We think of photos like, This is your tweet, this is your status update. And now it can be your image-based homing beacon too. To keep up with the news throughout the day, visit our Fast Feed page.
