Review: Understanding The Second Language Acquisition offers a broad survey of this growing field, its accumulated findings and proposed theories, its developed research paradigm, and its pending questions for the future. The book scales and goes out of universal, individual and social forces, in each case evaluating theories and research results that have been created in various naturalistic and formal contexts to acquire a second language. It does not involve any reference data in the SLA and provides useful chapter-by-chapter summaries and suggestions for further reading. Ideal as a textbook for students of applied linguistics, foreign language education, TESOL and education. It is also recommended for students of linguistics, psycholinguistics, psychology and cognitive sciences. She is currently a professor of applied linguistics at Georgetown University. Her research focuses on acquiring a second language and writing a second language. She is noted for her work in acquiring a second language and for recommending that syntactical complexity be measured multi-thought. Along with Cumming, Highland, Cormos, Manhon, Matsuda, Polio, Storch and Verspur, Ortega is considered one of the most outstanding scholars in the writing of the second language. (who?) Ortega received a master's degree in English as a second language in 1995 and a PhD in Second Language in 2000 from the University of Hawaii at Manoa. She taught applied linguistics at Georgia State University from 2000-2002, Northern Arizona University from 2002-2004, university of Hawaii at Manoa in 2004-2012 and Georgetown University from 2012. She is the editor-in-chief of the Language Learning: A Journal of Research in Language Studies, a peer-reviewed academic journal. Ortega's research notes in the acquisition of a second language for her work entitled TO THE CAF's Investigative Approach to SLA: A Case of Complexity published in Applied Linguistics, in which she argued, along with John Norris, that syntactical complexity should be measured multi-thought.
