A light novel (ライトノベル) is a novel often accompanied by anime or manga illustrations usually aimed at middle-school-age readers. Light novels fall into the category of wasei-eigo, a Japanese term that borrows an English dictionary but is not part of an English idioms. In Japan this type of novel is often called a ranobe (ラノベ) or LN in the west. This type of novel is usually 40,000-50,000 words in length (short LN is about the same length as novels), very rarely exceeds 200 pages, often published on a meeting schedule, usually published in bunkobon size, and often accompanied by illustrations. LN stories are often serially published in journals before publication as a book. Detail of Light novel the evolution of a Japanese small magazine novel (pulp magazine). To appeal to readers, starting in the 1970s, this type of magazine began inserting illustrations into stories and included articles about popular movies, anime and games, first adopted styles of anime and manga covers. The evolving narrative adapts to the interests of the new generation and is ultimately full of contemporary illustrations. Successful series are then printed as a book. The story of a series of light novels has been widely adapted into manga, anime or live action movies. Light novels are usually published in literary magazines such as Faust, Gekkan Dragon Magazine, The Sneaker and Dengeki hp, or franchised media magazines such as Comptiq and Dengeki G's. A classic example of the 90s is Hajime Kanzaki's novel Slayers, which was adapted into manga, and the anime novels of the same name are a very popular medium in Japan. Publishers periodically look for new talent, holds annual competitions, with prize money and novel publishing. The Dengeki Novel Prize is the largest competition in Japan, with 2,000 titles a year. This type of novel is marked by a light label of a novel printed in an economical form with a soft cover (paperback). For example, the price of LN Melancholia Haruhi Suzumia in Japan is 514 pounds (plus 5% VAT), which is equal to the normal price of printed paperback trading; easy novels and works of common literature; sold in Japan. In 2007, it was estimated that the market for LN was about 20 billion pounds ($166.7 million at a rate of 120 euros) and about 30 million copies were published per year. Kadokawa Group Holdings, the main owner of Kadokawa Sneaker Books and Dengeki Books, owns 70% to 80% of the market. In 2009, the cost of light novels was 30.1 billion euros, or about 20% of total sales of books in the form of Buncobon in Japan. Translation of Japanese light novels into English because of low demand. Some light novels have been translated by internet users on other sites, but in April 2007 Seven Seas Entertainment, the first English publisher to publish light novels in its Japanese edition, was at 10.5 cm x 15 cm. The novel's easy writing style is designed for entertainment, so its writing style differs from that of adult literature. Ordinary light novels use a simple and simple style in paragraphs consisting of one or three sentences.
