After opening its first retail stores in the early 1900s, the company found its niche in both urban and suburban markets. The retailer's heyday occurred in the mid-20th century, when it had stores in almost every major mall in America. Like Kmart, however, Sears began to go downhill around the year 2000. Making a final effort to save both companies, Kmart acquired Sears in 2004 and renamed parent company Sears Holdings. Under the new leadership, the two retailers began selling many of their exclusive lines in both stores. The business has steadily improved, and Sears Holdings is one of the leading retail companies in the United States today. It operates about 4,000 locations under the Sears and Kmart tree heads.
