Many parents quickly take the easy way out when their child doesn't like something right away like swimming lessons. There is not one correct answer on how to remove a frightened child from swimming lessons, but you should consider some critical issues before making a decision. Find out what the experts are saying before you pull your child out of swimming lessons or get them to continue. The reasons why you can quit your swimming lesson program fall into three broad categories: your child's safety is in question. The YMCA, which teaches thousands of young people to swim in more than 2,000 swimming pools across the country each year, says instructors should be trained to teach swimming lessons for your child's level and age. The child should be in class with swimmers who are similar to his age and skills. Swim instructors should also be in the pool with the children they teach, not on deck, the organization said. They must be certified in CPR and first aid, in addition to formal swim instructor training. If any of these conditions are not met, your child's safety may be in question and you should pull your child out of the program, the group says. You are not allowed to observe swimming lessons. You should be able to observe swimming lessons, although you should reserve any questions you may have before or after sessions to avoid creating a distraction in- and therefore a safety issue, for the instructor and students, says YMCA Triangle in Raleigh, North Carolina Teacher forces your child to learn skills. YMCA says it's a big no-no: As your child develops the basics, progressing to the next level of swim should be based on a child's ability to swim, not his or her age. The instructor should always allow your child to learn through natural development when he is ready both mentally and physically. Forcing a child to learn skills is counterproductive and can be unsafe. There is a very important reason why you should continue to your participate in swimming instructions, even if she resists: Swimming lessons save lives. Drowning is the second leading cause of accidental deaths of children between the ages of 1 and 14, according to the American Red Cross. About 10 people die from unintentional drowning every day, and of these, two are two children under the age of 14, according to the CDC. The Red Cross says the solution is simple: There is an easy way to help reduce tragic drownings: teach children to swim. So even if your child doesn't want to take swimming lessons, learning to swim can one day save his life: the key uses the best techniques recommended by experts to teach him how even if he is scared in the first place. The American Academy of Pediatrics says children can safely take swimming lessons as early as the age of 1. Dr Jeffrey Weiss, lead author of a policy statement on water safety and swimming published by the group in 2010, said: Children should learn to swim, but even advanced swimming skills cannot drown a child of any age. Parents should also keep a close eye on their children around the water and know how to perform CPR. AAP and other experts say that getting a frightened child to take swimming lessons means going slow and not forcing him to learn too early, and ensuring that any swim program takes the same view. They offer these tips: Do your child have swimming lessons, but don't start if she is too young. Since children are developing at different rates, not all children will be willing to swim at the same age, says AAP. Lessons should start by teaching children not to be afraid of water, Jane E. Brody advised in Swimming and Fear Factor, an article published in 2010 in the New York Times. They must learn to make their faces wet, blow bubbles, lift their faces and catch their breath. They then learn to swim and breathe properly, making simple strokes like a dog paddle and on the back, said the widely published Health and Nutrition author. Make sure the classes aren't too big. Group classes should include no more than four to six students per teacher, the YMCA said in a statement. The small teacher-student ratio gives the instructor enough time to help your child overcome his fear in the water and learn to swim in a relaxed, stress-free manner. Let your child acclimatize to the water gradually, perhaps before you even put her in a swimming class, says Amy Przeworski, an associate professor at Case Western Reserve University in Cleveland, in Face to Fear, without pushing a child over the edge, published in 2014 in Psychology Today. If your child can't jump into the deep end of the pool today, let it start at the shallow end, she adds. As noted, if a swimming instructor forces your child to do too much, too fast, she is in the wrong class: Find another program. Respect the fact that your child is really scared and not make him go faster than he is able to, says psychotherapist Ison Schafer, author of The Dear, I've Ruined In her practice. Schafer uses desensitization to help children and adults overcome their fears, she told Parent magazine for an article titled Help Your Child Overcome overcome Fear of water. She also noted: From a sensory point of view, a public pool can be overwhelming for some children - the smell of chlorine, the noise, the crowds. It can be frustrating when little Emma refuses to take the plunge while the fun continues without her. But with a calm, consistent approach... You should soon see progress. Slowly increasing your child's impact on the water, with every little step building on the last, he can learn to enjoy the water, and swimming lessons, Schafer added. The key to getting a frightened child to take swimming lessons is to go slow, allow her to acclimatize first to the water and then to the class, and to ensure that the swim program has the same go-slow policy. Don't force children who really have fear, Tracy Warren, national director and expert on child safety at Safe Canada, said of the parents. Take a step back. 1.
