It's actually based on the Dragon Booster cartoon, (hence the name duh!), which isn't very popular here in the UK, but I've seen it before and still gets played from time to time. While most gamers have a re-run for a new and exciting racing game, they certainly won't find anything new or exciting in this title. Dragon Booster is due to lack of a better term race game, and while some out there may think that there are a few Dragon tanks trapped here they would be right, both games have dragons, but that's where the similarities end. Taken from the TV show, Dragon Booster features a young man named Arta Penn who has been challenged with keeping the world Arming and then racing your dragon in a series of races cause the world. This idea in itself is pretty stupid, and the game doesn't make all that back story there's any justice. For all I know, the planet is going to blow up if this little dragon doesn't take the top spot (not so, but I have no idea about the plot, really). But no, the game just doesn't do enough adequate work, letting the player know what the deal is. I suppose if I was watching an animated series I might know what's going on, but I don't, so I don't. But back to the game once you have a sufficiently armed dragon you then enter a race course that includes you and three other riders/dragons speeding along the obstacles scattered track. Of course, you must not only take the first place, but you have to fight other dragons both defensively and offensively. It's not a new idea to mind you, but hey, there's some action to be found here. The fact is that you have to take the first place in order to move the story (as it is) together, nothing new here, but there is a seriously stressful finishing order if you are not able to take the first place. Of course, this is the time of the DS game you can usually count on a small action stylus to keep you motivated to play a little longer. Well, I'm here to tell you that it's just not a plus in this title. Not only does you use a stylus to control the dragon as it evades obstacles (you move it with the D-pad), jumps for items, and adapts to attack enemies by increasing or reducing speed, but then you have to factor in the face buttons, and if you are like me (right hand), then holding the stylus and trying to whip the buttons on any rhythmic order is simply impossible. I finally discovered that by using my thumb (while still holding a stylus) I could somewhat accomplish what I needed, but it's just not fun. And I mean, that's just not fun because it's too darn clumsy? sort of way. The developers should have all been left-handed because you have to be really dialed with your stylus control as it was, or you just wouldn't complete the first place finish. In conclusion I will say that the graphics were a bit on the disappointing side. I can see what they've been trying to do, and the shading of the cells isn't all that bad, but it's not good either. Music, on the other hand, is acceptable and one of the only high point games. But don't get me started on multiplayer, the only thing they got right was one card to play otherwise it could only be described as an ugly mess. For the love of everything that is sacred, stay away from this game, this is one of the worst examples of license use out there.
