These are the main questions that start each test. The examiner will then move on to a personal topic with four questions related to it. The examiner can only ask an exact question on the map. He won't explain any questions if you ask - he'll just repeat the question once, and if you don't understand then he'll move on. You may ask about the meaning of specific words - for example: Examiner: What is your favorite season? Candidate: What do you mean by season? That is ok! The examiner will ask about 2 topics and then move on to Part 2 (combined with the basic intro questions, which is about 11 questions in Part 1). Take a good look! In Part 2 of the test, you will be given 1 minute to plan and 2 minutes to talk. If the expert does not do so, you can file a formal complaint. Topics vary between personal and more general. Be sure to keep talking all the time - the expert will stop you. At the end of the second part, the examiner will ask a question about rounding - not to give another long answer to this question. The short answer to this question is best. The next part of the test will continue with the same theme. Do some practice with the questions below - here are some ideas on how you can practice alone without speaking partner. These are all current topics that can come up. will start with a theme from Part 2 but expand it to make it more general and complex. Most questions will be shared, so try not to give personal examples or talk about yourself (that's fine if you do it sometimes). Typically, the examiner asks 6 to 10 questions in this part of the test. The examiner should paraphrase what's in his book (as opposed to part 1 where he just reads from a pamphlet). That's why students will report slightly different wording for questions - not two experts will use exactly the same words, but the meaning of the questions will be the same. The expert should also ask one follow-up question on each question in the brochure. These follow-up questions will vary depending on the expert, and if you are a strong candidate the examiner will ask more difficult questions to challenge you. Read on!
