Animations look good when navigating your phone or tablet, but they can cause delays and even slow down less powerful devices. Turning them off can improve the performance of your Android device. This trick has been around for a while, so you may already be familiar with it. But if you're new to Android or just upgraded to a new phone and forgot about it, here's what you do: Make sure the developer's options are included. If that's not the case, go to the Settings of the phone, then click on the build number a few times to turn it on to the settings of the developer's settings, and scroll down to the scale of the animation box, the transition animation scale, and the timeline of the animator. Click on each of the animation options and turn them off. Don't forget to leave the Developer settings on to keep the animation off. Turning off the Developer settings will throw the animation back into the default settings. If you want some more Android performance tips, check out our guide to cleaning up Android spring.
