However, several factors point to the academic success of the student. While some may not finish top of their class, they may hold leadership positions in multiple student groups or score high on standardized tests such as the SAT or ACT. Scientific Achievements and Skills People often consider classes primarily when determining academic performance. This includes schools that rank students by their GPA, awarding special designations such as valedictorian and salutatorian to those who graduate first and second in their class. Scholarship organizations and universities also start by studying grades, as do some employers, especially when hiring recent graduates. Varieties carry more weight in some industries, especially technical professions such as law, medicine and finance. Other industries are less important to THE GPA, especially creative professions such as writing or art and professions such as sales, where people's skills are more important than technical knowledge. Estimates do not always reflect a person's knowledge or intelligence. Some students do not work very well in the classroom, but are very smart and earn high grades on intelligence tests, standardized testing or college entrance exams. Universities Employers consider these scores along with other measurements and can forgive less-than-ideal GPA for students who perform well on these tests. Some tests, such as law school admissions (LSAT) and Medical College admissions (MCAT), determine, determine, is accepted to graduate school. Law firms and medical institutions are also important on these scores and can eliminate those who score below a certain number. Extracurricular Achievement Definition of Academic Achievement extends to achievements outside the classroom. Some of the brightest students do not earn directly, but very comprehensively, succeeding in everything from music to athletics. The ability to master a diverse set of skills illustrates intelligence, curiosity and perseverance, qualities attractive to universities and employers. Some colleges will recognize and even award scholarships to students who have earned average grades, but display a model of achievement consistently teaching new skills. Many businesses also see this as a selling point, thinking that these candidates want to learn and will train easily. The initiative may also indicate academic performance. Some students demonstrate their competence by acting as president of the student body or holding officer positions in student groups such as the Honor Society or Science Club. Or, they can regularly organize student events such as fundraisers, brisk rallies or dances. Others participate in volunteer organizations and coordinate food campaigns or other public outreach efforts. Universities and employers look positively at consistent leadership activities, feeling that these students will bring the same drive to their classrooms or boardrooms. In an argumentative essay, students must choose a subject, create strong arguments related to the topic and address counter-arguments to their position. To find material for these types of essays, students may be required to read published studies on the topic or conduct their own, doing experiments, surveys or interviews. The structure of an argumentative essay can vary. In some cases, the controversial essays are five paragraphs that consist of an introduction, three paragraphs of the body that deal with arguments and counter-arguments, and conclusion. In longer essays, students can delve into contextual issues related to the topic, as well as argue points and counterpoints made throughout the essay. In order to successfully write an argumentative essay, students need to be sure that their topic is actually controversial. Students should ask themselves whether others can argue against their position and figure out how the opposition will react. Moreover, for a topic to be controversial, it must be supported by scientific research and not based on personal morality or cultural or religious standards. Kevin Dodge/Blend Images/Getty Images Academic Letter Style Letters is governed by rules and practices such as formal structure and order, quotes for research in ideas, as well as the use of correct spelling, grammar and punctuation. A formal tone is also needed. Academic letter letter from personal writing primarily because it explores and analyzes theories in depth and offers explanations for social customs, problems and events. The structure of academic writing usually includes the beginning, middle and end and is often written in the style of an essay with a certain structure, such as explanatory, narrative, descriptive or argumentative. Academic writing also usually requires reliable scientific research to support ideas and theories. Formal quotations in a given format, such as the style of the Contemporary Language Association, are used to quote in the text and the library page. Academic writing can also focus on abstract ideas, concepts and theories, such as analysis of customs, traditions, or behaviors in human development. Academic writing requires a writer to write in a formal tone that eliminates any colloquial phrases and writes to a certain audience. Often the target audience is determined before writing the article to make sure that the language is attractive and appropriate for the audience. Don't get painful, but there's another step to #adulting that you probably haven't thought about - especially if you don't have children or at home. This creates will be, and even if it may not be a fun thing to think of, experts say peace of mind in getting it done is worth it. I firmly believe that every twentysomething needs will, says Kathy Gampietro Burke, a certified financial planner. Depending on your state, documents such as power of attorney, live will, power of attorney for health care, and advanced directives for health care can be helpful as well. This may sound like a lot to add to the to-do list, but experts say they're pretty easy to create properly - especially when you don't have a ton of assets. If you're tight on money, online will or form better than no will, said Scott Wellikoff, an attorney in Boca Raton, Fla. Finally, experts agree that in addition to making sure that you have legal documents completed and signed, make sure you tell your family and friends what your wishes are - and where they can find the documents in (very!) unlikely if they need them. It can be helpful to give a copy of the will and related documents to a trusted friend or relative, as well as to keep the originals in a deposit safe or a safe place in your home. Here's what you need to make sure your loved ones are covered. 1) Life insuranceWhat is: In exchange for a premium, a lump sum is issued after the death of the beneficiary. This money usually covers outstanding debts and funeral expenses and is given to the beneficiary (relative, friend, child - you decide) after these costs are paid. How to get it: Policies are available online and can provide a pretty immediate about what you expect to pay. Haven Life Insurance is one fully online life insurance company that can Immediate quote about how much a policy can cost (about $25 to $40 a month if you don't have children.) 2) The latter will and testament what it is: a legal document that provides how your assets will be divided when you leave. Even if you have more debt than assets, it will be worth completing (and don't panic if you have debt because most of the debt - including credit card debt - will not be transferred along with your parents or immediate family members if you are the sole card holder). Even if your asset division seems insignificant (your BFF gets your collection of vintage dresses; your work wife gets your MacBook Pro), it ensures that your wishes are fulfilled as you intended, and relieves stress from loved ones to understand it. How to get it: Internet templates exist. One option Wellikoff offers if you're tight on cash, but want to make sure your going to be airtight is to work with an online template and then see if you can find a real estate lawyer to work with you on an hourly basis and make sure you've thought about everything. 3) Pre-directiveWhat is: a written statement of retirement at the end of life if you are unable to communicate your wishes in the event of an illness or accident. How to get it: Preliminary forms of directive exist online and often include two elements, depending on your condition: First, the name of the health proxy - the person who can make decisions about the care you receive. This is necessary, especially if you want to make sure that a particular person - like your significant other - can make decisions for you rather than your next of kin. Secondly, it will be alive. This determines what your wishes for end-of-life care are, including not resuscitate orders, and your wishes for organ donation. Again, your preliminary directive is to discuss with whomever you choose as your health proxy. It shouldn't be a surprise that they bear this responsibility later. Bottom line: Although death is not someone who likes to think, it's best to be prepared. Wellikoff recommends reviewing your paperwork every year or so, especially if you've gotten into a new relationship, have a nephew or niece whom you can name as the beneficiary of your life insurance policy, or want to reconsider asset allocation. And if you do everything online, the double and triple checks that you've followed all directions - just one missing signature from a witness can make the whole thing going to be invalid. (Don't believe us? read this horrible story about a man his partner's relatives kicked out of the house because his partner didn't have a second signature on his will.) Finally, make your latest wishes current with family and friends. We're not saying that you should discuss it at every happy hour, but once a year or so can be helpful. After all, knowing that you've got each other's back -- even in the afterlife -- can only make your bond bond Until Death Week. This week we will try to unpack our feelings, fears and hangers about death, death and mourning. We will do our best not to leave the tombstone intact.
