(December 2012) The Portuguese Civil Code was adopted on 25 November 1966 and came into force on 1 June 1967, abolishing the first Civil Code, drafted by the Sibra Vikonth and which came into force in Portugal almost a century ago, in 1868. His text was written by a group the law, which was headed by Professor Joan de Matos Antunes Varela during the review and final phase, is therefore often known as the Varela Codex, unlike the previous Seabra Code; the other law professors involved in the project were Adriano Vaz Serra, Fernando Pires de Lima, Antonio Ferrer Correia, Vasco Labo Xavier and Rui de Alarchao (U. de Coimbra) and Manuel Duarte Gomez da Silva and Inocencio Galvao Teles (U. de Lisboa). The Code adopts the German classification of civil law branches, according to the BGB (short for Burgerliches Gesetzbuch, German Civil Code of 1900), divided into five books: The common part that concerns the general principles of civil law in Portugal. The Obligation Act examines the types of connections, their characteristics, effects and extinction. Rem rights relate to property rights, movable and real estate, as well as ways of transferring those rights. Family law contains legal provisions related to the structure, organization and protection of the family, as well as the responsibilities and rights arising from such a relationship. The Succession Act takes care of the transfer of assets, rights and responsibilities by death. The fourth book on the constitution and the functioning of family relations was significantly changed in 1977, after the revolution on April 25 and, in 2010, by legal approval of same-sex marriage, but all others have undergone only one-off changes. Some former Portuguese overseas provinces still have the Portuguese Civil Code. In Macau, it no longer comes into force and has been replaced by the 1999 Macau Civil Code, which is an update and adaptation of the 1966 Code. History Before the adoption of the first Civil Code, Portugal has a legal system based on Roman law. Portuguese legislation was drafted into three major editions entitled Dedication: Codex Aconsino or Atonsinic Ordination, 1448 (officially in 1446 D. Pedro, Duke of Coimbra); Manuel Code or Manuelin Or Ordination, 1512-1520 (King Manuel I; changed in 1526, 1533 and 1580); Philippine Code or Philippine Decrees, 1603. Although they have changed a lot, they formed the basis of the Portuguese language before the adoption of successive codes of the 19th century. Although the Mysteries are considered precursors to the encoder movement of the century. XIX, they can not compare with modern codes, because they do not have the systematic organization of these, functioning only as collections of laws. The first code in Portugal was the Commercial Code of 1833, author Ferreira Borges. The Civil Code of 1867 was the first Portuguese Civil Code. It was approved in 1867 and came into force in 1868. It was also called the Sibra Codex, as it was designed by Antonio Luis de Sibra e Souza, 1st Viscount Sibra. The Code would be repealed by the existing Portuguese Civil Code(Varela Code), which came into force in 1967.
