We're talking about a lot of interesting things here at How-To Geek that you can do by editing the Windows registry. Sometimes, however, you will work in a key registry or value that you do not have permission to edit. When you try, you'll see an error message that says, You can't edit: error, new value content. Fortunately, as with the Windows file system, the Registry provides tools that allow you to take responsibility and edit the permissions for the keys. Here's how to do it. A registry editor is a powerful tool and a misuse of it can make your system unstable or even unworkable. So there's a reason why some of these registry keys are protected. Editing a secure key can sometimes ruin Windows or an app that includes the key. We will never point you to any hacks that we haven't tested ourselves, but it still pays to be careful. If you've never worked with the Register before, think about how to use a registry editor before you come up with one. And definitely back time registry (and your computer!) before making changes. RELATED: Learn to use a registry editor like Pro In Registry Editor, right to press a key that you can't edit (or a key that contains a value you can't edit) and then select The Resolutions from the context menu. In the Resolution appearing window, click Advanced. Next, you're going to take charge of the key registry. In the Advanced Security Settings window next to the listed owner, click on the Change link. In the Select user or group box, enter the name of the object to choose to enter the name of your Windows user's account (or email address if you have a Microsoft account), and then click Check names to verify the account name. When this is done, click OK to close the Select user or group window, and then click OK again to close the Advanced Security Settings window. Back in the normal Permission window, select a group of users, and then select check-box Allow next to The Full Control resolution. If you prefer, you can simply give your user account full permission rather than a group of users. To do this, click Add, go through the steps to add a user account to the list, and then give that account full management permission. Whichever method you choose, click OK when you're done to return to the registry editor. Once back in the registry editor, you should now be able to make changes to the key to which you have taken ownership and give yourself full permission to edit. Chances are you won't face keys that are often used when editing a registry. We rarely encounter them ourselves. However, it's good to know how to get around this protection when you need to.
