This guy - Here are 3 preludes that I wrote for the snare drum over the summer. Now before you get everything why call it a prelude? I'll explain the concept to me. The original idea of the Prelude in classical music was a piece that would be played at the beginning of a recital or concert. It was written using the full spectrum of the instrument (both dynamically and harmoniously) so that the performer could ensure that their instrument was in harmony and working properly. An example of this can be seen in Bach's preludes for the cello. If you ever get to know them on a marimba (or just look at the notes), you'll notice that they're almost entirely based on alternating between scale and arpedjit passages up and down the instrument. It was my goal to adopt the same concept and apply it to the drum trap. Thus, the pieces have a very rudimentary style at the beginning, but later branch into a few more dense musical passages. There are many examples that give the performer the opportunity to check the snare drum to make sure it works. Both the first and the third prelude use both traps and switches off, as well as play on the rim. All preludes contrast and the dynamics. The introduction of all three preludes is a strict F/P, but later develops in a very specific dynamic in the middle, ranging from PP to FF. Thanks for checking this out, I hope you enjoy it!
