Just behind the Cathedral is St. George's Square. The buildings around it are the residences of the canons, and on the right you can see the old building, which at the end of the 18th century on the orders of Empress Maria Theresa was turned into a home for nobles who fell in difficult times. The square takes its name from the centuries-old Church of St. George, which has a Baroque facade and is easily recognizable thanks to the twin bell towers that are the hallmark of the castle skyline. The appearance of the church was significantly altered by the work done over the centuries, and restoration work on the inside brought to light the original Romanesque structure, dating back to 1100. Dating from the Middle Ages is a series of ceiling frescoes above the high altar, while the work of baroque reconstruction has given us a beautiful staircase descended into the crypt, as well as the beautiful chapel of St. John nepomuk. The huge monastery of St. George, built to the left of the church, is home to a magnificent part of the 19th century National Gallery, featuring paintings, furniture, objects, furniture and clothing. If you follow the road that is curly along the right side of the church, you will come to the seventeenth century Lobkovicz Palace, the most important private residence inside the perimeter of the castle wall. Inside, beautifully restored and painstakingly restored by the owners, there is now a magnificent museum. One of the most popular with tourists, the museum displays a wonderful collection of the Lobkovich family, which includes beautiful porcelain and ceramics, as well as a series of paintings by Italian, German and Spanish masters such as Velazquez, Cranach and Canaletto, and above all, the famous breathless Haymaking of Peter Bruegel the Elder, a true masterpiece. The museum has a large section dedicated to music, in which you can see the period of instruments and notes, including some originals of Mozart and above all Beethoven, including the music of his two famous symphonies, the Fourth and Fifth. Interesting fact: the Lobkovich family has a Jewish origin and twice was deprived of the palace: first by the Nazis and then by the Communists. Only in 2012, after a twelve-year trial, thanks to the laws of Czech President Vaclav Havel, the ownership was restored to the Lobkovich family, which opened a museum there in 2007. The explanations are in an unconventional, fun and at the same time educational form of conversation between the Prague guide, Anna, and the tourist Tom. Tom asks Anna about almost everything you ask yourself. For the most authentic listening, Anna's voice is provided by her native Czech, who speaks fluent English, and for Tom, of course, we borrowed the voice of the native English speaker. Conversations with taste and thematically are accompanied by music and various sound effects. You can get a better impression by listening to free samples. The whole project is based on centuries of experience of Prague tour guides. You can find a list of topics and visited the attractions in a section entitled List of Entries.
