Watching movies is a fun activity mostly no matter where you live. It's relatively inexpensive to do, you can share experiences with friends, and with movies stunning box office revenue each year, movies are as big as they've ever been. Watching movies has never been easier. You can look at your phone, tablet, computer, TV or local cinema. This means that there is a metric ton of movie apps that do all kinds of different things. Let's take a look at the best movie apps for Android! Of course, you can always Google Search Movies as well. Google search is very well configured for movies with Showtimes, trailers, cast, and other details. We would also like to give an honorable mention of Letterboxd (Google Play link). It is a social network for film and film lovers to meet, talk about, and recommend movies to each other. Social networking is hard to recommend in general, especially when there are subreddits for this exact thing, but it is something to think about. CineTrakPrice: Free/$3.99-$99.99CineTrak is a movie and TV show tracking app. You enter all the movies and shows what you've watched, and the app tracks them for you. It also works as a detection platform for shows and movies that you may like. It captures reviews and information from IMDb, Trakt, Metacritic, and Rotten Tomatoes. The user interface is fairly easy to use, and the app is an interesting way to get a review of your movie experience. The base price is $3.99, but it scales from there. The $99.99 version comes with a top contributor icon and codes for a few other people, so you can buy and share if you want. Criterion ChannelPrice: Free trial /$10.99 per month/$99.99 per year Criterion Channel is a specialized film streaming service. It has a bunch of Hollywood blockbusters, as you'd expect. However, it also has a collection of indie films, international films and art-house stuff. So it's a great way to expose yourself to the next few layers below what you'll find in theaters. The service is a bit expensive and the app needs a bit of work, but we like the basic idea a lot and the bugs are usually temporary. Netflix DVD or RedboxPrice: Free trial/$7.99-$14.99 per month DVD Netflix and Redbox are movie apps for DVD rentals and Blu-ray. DVD Netflix has plans as low as $7.99 per month and range to $14.99 per month. Redbox comes with a day-to-day rental structure. For those who rarely watch movies, Redbox may be better, but movie buffs will get more from a Netflix DVD subscription for the price. Either way, you rent a movie, watch it and then return it when you did just like you did with Blockbuster back in the day. Both services work pretty well part of the time. Google TVPrice: Free/Film and Show Price varyGoogle TV (formerly Google Play Movies and TV) is one of the best movie streaming apps on Android. You buy a movie and TV TV and then stream them as often as you want. You can also download for offline use if necessary. There are several great apps for this, including Vudu, Amazon Prime Video, and others. However, for Android users, we like to play movies because it is tied to your Google account, it supports 4K streaming (on some movies) and it's fairly easy to use. However, if you are already using one of these other services by all means, keep using it. HooplaPrice: FreeHoopla is a unique app. This is directly related to the local library. The library card credentials can be used to watch movies, TV shows, books, music, and comics. The whole service is free and you can check out as much media as you want. That makes it great for movie watchers on a budget. The app also includes Chromecast support, Android TV support, and special comic book viewing features. The only downside is your local library should be part of the Hoopla network for its operation. IMDbPrice: FreeIMDb is an excellent all-in-one movie app. You can find reviews, information, trailers, actor information, and other amusing content like behind-the-scenes clips. It even supports things like local Showtimes, ticket purchases, and more. You can get all these things from individual services. For example, most entertainment blogs cover news movies and apps such as Flixster sells tickets. However, we understand that IMDb can basically do it all. Some people don't like ads, but everything else is good. If you want movie news, Feedly, Flipboard, or other news aggregates, probably a little better option. Movies AnywherePrice: Free / Movie Prices varyMovies Everywhere is an exceptional movie app. It allows you to log in to Google, Vudu, Amazon Prime Video, Xfinity and other accounts. You can then watch any movies that you have purchased in any of these services. This eliminates the exclusivity of one app and allows you to play on the field when it comes to selling movies or promotional offers. The app is completely free and comes with basics like Chromecast support. It still has a few quirks to run and it needs 4K support, but it's otherwise a great movie app. PlexPrice: Free/$0.99/$3.99 per monthPlex is one of the best movie apps for anyone with a local film collection. You can turn your computer into a Plex server and watch movies on almost any device. Plex has an Android app as well as apps for most modern consoles. You also get Chromecast support, so you can watch it and control it right with This is easily the best method in its genre for this kind of thing. The subscription service adds a bunch of extra content if you want it. Finally, Plex partnered with Crackle in 2020 to provide ad-supported (but otherwise free) movies on its free service. This only strengthens its position as one of the great movie apps. PopcornTriviaPrice: FreemiumPopcornTrivia is the trivia game for Lovers. He emulates the question-and-answer style of those movie quizzes they work in the theater before the trailers begin to play. It offers trivia on a bunch of movies in many genres. The questions also have varying complexity. Developers add new questions consistently, and it's a good companion to film a night at home or while you're in the theater. Also, the game is just fun. TubiPrice: Free (with ads) Tubi is one of the few 100% legal movie streaming services. It uses advertising to generate revenue instead of a subscription model, and thus it's great for watching movies on a budget. It supports both TV shows and movies. It also adds new content every week. The app also comes with feature favorites, a queue to the watch list, and other streaming support services. Most of its users don't even complain about advertisements: Netflix, Hulu, Amazon Prime VideoPrice: Free trials /services vary in priceTraditional streaming services perfectly called for movies. Most of them focus on TV shows because those are a little more binge friendly. However, Hulu, Netflix, Amazon Prime Video, Vudu, and others have a good selection of movie content as well. Some channel apps, such as HBO and Disney, love to hoard their content for their own streaming services, so if you don't find what you like on mainstream video streaming services, try HBO, STAR and Disney. Your local theater appPrice: Free / VariesMany major theater companies have apps for frequent guests. Most of these apps have the same features. You can check movie time, watch trailers, buy tickets, buy tickets at the theater, and most of them also have a rewards program for frequent movie visitors. We don't care which one you go with, and you're probably stuck with what's near you anyway. However, we found apps for AMC Theaters, Regal Cinemas, Cinemark Theaters, Marcus Theaters, and some others with a major Google Play Store search. Fandango, Flixter, Atom TicketsPrice: Free / VariesFandango, Flixster and Atom Tickets, among others, represent a secondary segment of ticket sales in movie apps. They usually offer the same features, including being in the movies, buying tickets, and more. You can also check out movie news, trailers, some behind-the-scenes footage, and other stuff. We think IMDb does it a little better than these movie apps. We also recommend that you go with a dedicated movie theater app above them to sell tickets. However, these are useful, useful applications that work well most of the time. If you want movie news, Feedly, Flipboard, or other news aggregates, probably a little better option. Motorola is one of those iconic, feel good phone brands that makes you want to cheer for it - if you're a geek. Don't get me wrong. Me. non-geeks know about Motorola in what they are aware of that they make those Droid phones, but Motorola is right up there with Nokia, Palm, and BlackBerry as smartphone space pioneers. Since the acquisition of Lenovo, Motorola has been making some lovely phones, but too often, they come across like me phones too compared to the likes of Samsung, LG, HTC and others. Even Moto Mods - snap on accessories that make a really good argument for modular phone parts - allow your phone to stand out. But they don't do the job as effectively as what Motorola released to the masses four years ago - Moto Maker. I mean, of course, the Moto Maker is still available, allowing you to choose a mod for your Moto and Play - but you basically have to fool the Motorola website into showing itself. It's also a shell of his former self, and it makes me a little sad. We can build it - we have technology There was a time that Motorola wanted you to really make your phone yours. You can build your phone from scratch and design it to your own specifications. You can choose from many different materials and colors, and just in case there is any doubt, you can engrave the custom text on the back of the phone. I admit I'm still a little disappointed. I never got the chance to make back out of feathers. But if you want skin, for example, you could skin. If you dreamed of taking a dander strap on your phone, you could have wood. These days, Moto Mods are the best way you can hope to make your Motorola phone your own. Don't get me wrong - Moto Mods cool. But not as Moto Maker was, at least in terms of customization. Designing every aspect of your phone from the start gave your phone personality. These days, the only way to do this is with a phone case or skin, but isn't it just a cover for the phone? The funny thing is that the Moto NoZ Force, with its five-layer ShatterShield technology, doesn't even need a case, except for the side-screen protector, which is a completely different editorial. Designing every aspect of your phone from the beginning gave your phone personality with the phone as Force 2 around, setting it up will make the most sense in the world since you don't have to cover it. Moto Mods are good and all, but if I could design my own phone from scratch and be sure that it can survive whatever life is thrown at it (I'm why I can't have good things after all) that would be such a victory in my book. Not everyone had grandCustomized phones take timeNo, it's not like the Moto Maker was without a problem. In particular, individual phones take time. When ordering a Moto phone, your waiting time could be up to a week or more. Motorola built a factory in Texas just for Moto Maker phones, and it helped greatly. But in the On the day, if you walked into the store (well, one store in Chicago) and ordered a phone, you didn't leave the store with that phone. It was a little weird. Maybe we're all just spoiled by Amazon Prime now, but nothing more than two days for life. In addition, individual phones did not help resale. You can have a phone that says: Bad mother Effer on it, but it will be a tough Craigslist ad to write if Samuel L. Jackson happens to be on the market on his phone. Making your phone your must have done it is not for anyone else. Of course, these are both problems that Moto Fashion solved. Paying for the privilege But the very good thing about Moto Maker was that it didn't cost anything extra to make your phone yourself. And isn't that what it really comes down to? If you want to bring a new concept to the table, you can't expect people to pay for the experience. People are afraid of changing enough and are asking people to slap down $300 for a 360-degree camera that only works with one huge phone to ask. Meanwhile, Moto Maker doesn't charge anything extra for its settings. Sure, some of the backs cost a little more - $25 and $50 if memory serves up - but you don't have to spend that extra money on a bonus back if you don't want to. You have to put the Moto Mod on your Moto phone so as not to look like the parts are missing. An hidden motive? I get what Lenovo is trying to do - solve the Problems Moto Maker and sell some accessories on the side. In truth, this is probably the latter much more than the first, but Moto Mods are a costly risk for consumers to take. Moto Mods are pretty cool for what they are, but they don't go nearly that far, allowing the customer to truly personalize a very personal piece of technology. And the fact that they cost extra when the Moto Maker was free is almost a little offensive. I know that Moto Mods should not be a de facto moto maker replacement; it's a completely different thing. But when Lenovo axes Moto Maker at the same time it presents Moto Mods, it's hard not to miss the good days of OL. Moreover, at a time when Lenovo is trying to make Motorola as accessible and relativistic as possible, perhaps Moto Maker could be the company's answer to this problem. But maybe it's just me. Moto Mods go far enough to personalize your phone? Would you even mess with a Moto Maker made phone if you still could? Are you tired of the black/white/golden options that almost every phone comes up now? Leave us a comment below with your thoughts. Thoughts.
