Instagram is doing a few more shuffles, and this time it will affect your profile page. The social media platform is testing new features throughout November and December, including vaguely announced changes to icons and buttons, as well as navigation between tabs. It's not as dramatic an update as a redesigned Explore tab, or an algorithmic tape, but it's a small setup. In a blog post, Instagram said the grid display of your photos and videos won't change at all, but the icons above the grid can be a switch to words (grid, posts, IGTV, tagged). The profile picture can move to the right corner, pushing the username in large font to the top of the page. It looks like your followers and following will have less priority than before and the number of messages you've made will no longer be present. Side by side Follow and message button can be tested on profile pages, with even bigger options for business pages, including Start Order. We are working on these changes and will be testing them in stages and different combinations with our community over the next few weeks, the post said. We will continue to experiment and update the experience as we learn from your feedback. It's one of the softest updates Instagram has rolled out in the past few months since Instagram co-founders Kevin Systrom and Mike Krieger resigned in September, and Facebook's former head of News Feed, Adam Mosseri, took over as vice president of product. Only in October and November the platform announced a new daily usage dashboard called Your Activity, three new shopping features and a new name tag feature that resembles Snapchat's Snap codes. The platform is also finally doing something to crack down on fake likes and subscribers, moving to remove the likes, likes, and comments from shady third-party apps, and using machine learning to address bullying on its platform. Of course, Instagram had a major glitch on Tuesday. They weren't the only ones. Photo: Alex Ugalek/Shutterstock Instagram wants more companies to interact with their platform. The social network tests the profile pages in the app for local businesses. As with local Google knowledge groups, these profiles show the company's address, watch, phone number, URL, price range, and business type. Business owners can request a profile page, and if you manage a Facebook account for the same business, you can edit any inaccuracies. The deployment is not yet official, and no timetable to do so has been announced. But there are reports from SearchEngineJournal that some users see an update to their business pages. Stay tuned for more details as they are announced. Editor's note: Information about social media management services for your business? For example, in a Google business profile, you can view images added by others in your business and add your own. Google Bookings allows potential customers to book appointments directly from their profile. Google offers dashboard analytics to see who you reach. And you can create messages to promote sales or other special events. Perhaps the most important feature is the ability for business owners to respond to user feedback. It seems an unlikely feature to make it on the Instagram platform, but the platform supports direct messages, so we'll have to wait and see. Instagram launched in October 2010. It was bought by Facebook in 2012 for $1 billion, and by then it had attracted 30 million users. The platform introduced advertising online in 2015, and now has 2 million monthly advertisers. There are currently over 1 billion monthly active users, 121 million of whom are in the United States. More than 60 percent of them log in daily, making it the second social media engagement, just behind its parent Facebook brand. The most popular brand on the network is National Geographic, but on Instagram 25 million brands. Social network engagement is 10 times higher than on Facebook, so it will be interesting to see what effect business profile pages can have. I'm not sure about you, but I was a little confused about this whole discussion on the topic of trust. Do you really need to be more confident or should you try to be more humble? I think the answer is both - you just have to know where to use it. East VS West - Trust, It's a cultural thingIn typical Western countries, the answer to the trust debate is obvious - the more the better. Our heroes are rebellious, independent and first shoot, then ask questions. I think this snippet of dialogue from The Matrix sums up best: Agent Smith - We're ready to wipe the slate clean, give you a fresh start. All we ask in return is your cooperation in bringing a known terrorist to justice. Neo. Well, that sounds like a very good deal. But I think I might be better. How about I give you a finger (He does) neo "... and you give me my phone call. In eastern countries, the tone is often very different. Elders should be revered, not dismissed. The words guru teachers, and the philosophy of the dharma, are freely translated as debt, debt, Here. In Eastern cultures, humility and respect are more important than confidence. These perspectives are generalizations, but it shows how trust debate goes back deep into our culture. I think both extremes of pure certainty or pure humility are misguided. Instead of correcting this situation by simply mixing the two: becoming somewhat humble, somewhat confident all the time, I believe the answer is to know when to be confident and when to be humble. Modest Trust - Know when to use it! going to make another broad generalization. I believe that virtually every relationship that you are going to have is going to fit into one of the two main archetypes, either a master or a student. In peer relationships, this role of master/student can often switch, but it is extremely rare that relationships never lean one way. In the title role, you show confidence to get what you want. It is a speaker, leader or seducer. Being a master has its advantages. You have more control and ability to influence this role. The student's role is the opposite. You are deliberately humble. It is a student, student or follower. Being a student has advantages too. You can learn a lot more in this role and most likely win the trust of another person. Know when to shut up and find out if you're a typical Westerner, you're probably already thinking about what role you prefer. Being a leader is great. You get respect and higher status. Most of all you get a greater degree of control. But the problem is that you can't and shouldn't always try to be a leader. Attempting to assume this role without the skills, resources or status to back it up will lead to conflict. More importantly, there are many times when you intentionally want to show humility. Some of the benefits for a student role include: You'll learn more. A smooth relationship. Makes others more willing to lend a helping hand. Knowledge when taking a humble route in your favor. It is much easier to get mentors and counselors if you use humility rather than arrogance. A small sacrifice to your ego can open up the potential to learn a lot. Trust to convince, humility, to learnIn the reality of almost no relationship is as clearly defined as the master/student. In our relationships, people have overlapping areas of knowledge. I could be an expert in blogging, not a blogger, but they can be an expert in finance. There are different roles in each area. Before any interaction ask yourself what the goal is. Are you trying to find out or convince? Persuasion requires certainty. If you are trying to sell, instruct or bring you need to display confidence to match your post. But learning requires humility. You won't know anything if you're constantly arguing with your mentors or employers. Taking a dose of humility and Making yourself a student gives you the opportunity to absorb. Convince Less, Learn MorePersuasion is great for immediate effect, but training matters in the long run. Instead of washing all your communication with sheer confidence, look for learning opportunities. Persuading someone to follow you can give you an immediate increase in satisfaction, but this is not the last. Learning, however, is an investment in the future. Whenever I make a connection with someone and realize that they have the skills or understanding I want, I carefully express humility in this area. This means listening with what they say, even if I don't immediately agree and be patient with their response. This method often drastically reduces the time it takes for trial and error to learn for yourself. Trust/humility does not replace communication skillsIt approach selectively to use confidence and humility for various purposes does not replace communication skills. Humility won't work if the other person thinks you're an annoying whiner. Confidence won't work if the whole room thinks you're arrogant. Knowing how to show these two qualities requires practice. Next time you're about to engage ask yourself why you're doing it. Are you trying to convince or learn? Depending on what you can take a completely different tact for much better results.
