Detailed information found in the Privacy Policy [noh puhn in-ten-did] No pun is intended for a humorous parenthetical comment used to acknowledge one made in a pun or other little overly cheesy or clever pun-sometimes unwittingly, sometimes not. Adding no pun intended for misinterplay dates back at least to the early 1800s. From the outset, the term was of playful quality, used by a writer or speaker when making a pun, be it puns or other double entendres that were on his nose. An early example comes from a story from the mid-1800s about an offior turkey dubbed the Winged Game. The term is prevalent in the 20th and 20th years. Beat author William S. Burroughs roughly applied it to a 1937 piece of Esquire, for example: I'm proud of my mother. He's 71 and he's still expanding (mentally I mean, no pun intended). First, a pun on words, designed to be semi-absurd and comical by describing one thing or situation with words that also describe the situation with another meaning. For example, suppose you were a skinny farmer picking berries, but you can't find that much, another person might observe looks like thin pickins. Puns are often the worst kind of joke because they don't require much cleverness. If someone says no pun intended, however, this is when they say something that can be taken to have two meanings; obvious and a little off interpretation; and they want you to know that they don't intentionally play the words, and I want to make what they said that obvious meaning: the Jheteach on January 31, 2016A non-pun intended mug of bunk Manafort.AMERICAN phrase, widely considered by some to be a cliché. There are two uses for this term.#1. No pun intended! There is a clarification that having a comment said it doesn't actually include a pun. You exclaim, no pun intended, because frankly it does not mean that you need to create a sentence that contains pun.#2 The second meaning, no pun intended can be tongue-in-cheek, or grossly up, untrue. In this case, a person deliberately enters the pun. The motivations for this are different. Some of the reasons are: doing it humorous, trying to be smart, wanting to participate in the pun, or doing so to annoy people who hate puns. They fib by saying that no pun intended! because: they want to avoid embarrassment after no one laughed, escape retaliation from those that annoyed the purpose, or perhaps feel foolish to the pun at all.#1 Pun without intent. That gun is so tiny, it looks like a son of a gun. Sorry, it's not a pun! #2 Pun Intent: Watch that duck. I hope you have a lot of money just look at the the BILL! Hahaha!
