For example, take a 12-volt camping fridge/freezer. I've tried several two-zone units and found most fail to achieve the desired result of creating two completely separate zones of different temperatures. Some units simply include their vaporizer at one end of the fridge and (removable) inner wall to separate the areas. It then relies on cold air coming from the area you're trying to freeze at the other end, which you're trying to use as a refrigerator. Removing this wall then supposedly converts your refrigerator/freezer into a single-zone refrigerator or freezer. Unfortunately, it doesn't always work as planned with this method and I'm left with frozen food and drinks rather than nicely chilled. Other units have two separate zones with two separate controls that allow individual temperature settings. Technically, this will work better than the higher method, but unfortunately some fridge controls don't work as intended and I end up with frozen beer, a sluggish salad and a car load of unhappy campers. Recently to test a lot of single-zone refrigerators (September 2016) and find the newly released Refrigerator Opposite Lock to be ahead of the rest, I decided to put (also recently released) a 72-liter combined refrigerator/freezer for a long-term test. Before coming to another adventure, I connected the device with 240 volts in the shed just to monitor the temperature in both zones. I set the 32-liter section to -21 degrees Celsius and the 40-liter section to 3 degrees Celsius, and the results were positive. Then I changed the temperature in the zones and achieved perfect results again. Tinkering with temperatures in each zone to see how smart Opposite Lock electronics were also returned to pleasant results. Plonking the fridge window in Troopy showed how big it is. At 71.5 cm long x 45.5 cm wide x 60.5 cm tall, and weighing 30 kg when empty, you won't be karting it around you when full. And that's my only complaint with this double-zone fridge/freezer: the higher the box, the harder it is to easily access the contents. Something will almost always be under something else that makes it harder to access compared to the longer and lower unit that more side-by-side packaging. The inner removable basket is also large and narrow, but it can at least allow the contents of a larger area to be removed to facilitate access. The other (smaller) area does not have a basket. It is impossible to have a large refrigerator without taking a lot of area or the inclusion of tall walls. Basically, you have to have one or the other. The final solution may well depend on your 4x4 setup. With my Troopy, I have a lot in cabin height, so it's not a drama. Having been chugging away at 12 volts in the back of my 4x4 for well for five months, this opposite lock 72-litre fridge/freezer performed flawlessly in regards to maintaining pre-set temperatures as well as efficiency. It runs the battery flat a few times, given that it has sat on the road for more than a few days at a time - yes, I know I had to turn it off, but with the variable voltage of the cutout setting of 10.0, 10.7 and 11.8, not too much damage can be done for a deep battery cycle, given it will turn off itself at a preliminary voltage. A useful feature that I find invaluable is the standard wireless remote temperature reading that connects to the ciggie socket. With the reading for both compartments, as well as the battery voltage, I know the refrigerator is working as intended while driving. Ciggy's power plug is easily converted into merit-style by removing the red end of the cap, and it provides an improved connection point that is less likely to fall out on rough roads. The included canvas (external) and reflective (internal) tourist coating keeps direct sunlight (and heat) from the refrigerator, so it can help with battery durability due to less compressor time. Being able to offer kids ice pillars and ice cream while out camping, as well as storing frozen meat and vegetables in the freezer section, is pure camping indulgence and something I haven't been able to achieve before. Combined with crispy, cold salad, ice cold (not frozen) beer and milk in another area, the fridge kept all my family members more than happy. Given both sides (or zones) this device can be used as a refrigerator or freezer, or it is all used as a special refrigerator or as a dedicated freezer, makes this a versatile and convenient combination of refrigerator/freezer. This impressive two-zone refrigerator is a real winner, and given its quality 60mm thick, polyurethane-injected and insulated closet, variable speed 66-watt Snowmaster compressor with automatic and cost-saving settings, excellent refrigerator seals, internal LED lights (in both zones) and over-center locks on two separate lids, it should keep my entire crew happy. It also has an open alarm lid, which should prove invaluable when children try to nick another ice pole.
