I've always watched my journey with jazz and improvisation akin to someone's journey with a game of golf - every year, I hope to suck a little less than the previous one. And what is the most common answer I would get when I asked jazz musicians how best to get at it? Listen. The first time I listened to Keith Jarrett's album The Melody at Night, With You marked probably the most important moment in my development, not only as a jazz musician, pianist, or even artist, but also as a person. I don't think it has made me better at any of these things, but I know without a doubt the experience has turned my world upside down. The album is at the top of my list of uninhabited island items for a variety of reasons, some too personal to share without you buying me a whiskey (or two) in the first place. As with such great art, some will get it, some won't. Self-proclaimed jazz connoisseurs often turn their noses on this kind of album with the label it's not jazz, but I'm willing to guess that this is partly because it dares to be something other than loud and fast. I am also sure that we have never held a conclave on who will serve as infallible curators of all art. I am not here to preach the gospel of Keith Jarrett, but I owe a lot to the restrained, unapologetically simple, breathtaking beauty of his play on this album, and it would be unfair of me not to share it with you. Seattle-born Joseph Lee has played and coached the Houston Grand Opera, Wolf Trap Opera Company, Minnesota Opera, Shepherd School of Music at Rice University, Opera Lear Ottawa, Arizona Opera, Dera Dera Theater Center. Last summer at Wolf Trap Opera, he conducted Philip Glass's chamber opera The Fall of Usher's House in collaboration with the Halcyon stage in Washington, D.C.; and performed in concert with two pianos with Stephen Bleeer, artistic director of the New York Song Festival. Mr. Lee joined the Baylor University School of Music in 2016. Recent collaborations include performances with the Minnesota Opera, Arizona Opera, Arizona Opera, Ar
