You'd think this game might be a waste of time, but a few minutes in the game made us think differently. When you first start playing the game, everything seems to be just like the original Mario game, but as the catchy music starts to play and you advance Mario to go on, you will realize that there are many pitfalls in the game, and a lot I mean, almost more than half of the game is a trap. This may come across as very annoying at the beginning, but once you start getting the hang of this game, you might actually like it. Playing the game first hand can come across as a bit tiring initially as there are traps from the start of the game, literally out of a dead end. As the game progresses, you can detect traps that are laid out as plateaus going down, or platforms in the air, indicating spears appear out of nowhere and so on. The game is the perfect test of patience and Mario is likely to die 100 times in just the first 5 minutes. This is an exercise for the brain, in fact, remembering where the traps are all set out to follow in the next attempt. Getting past only the first level may seem impossible to many, but once a player gets into the groove of the game, clearing the levels may not seem like a huge task.
