System1 Company Photo by Tim Patterson.Dear Stumped, Finding a reliable storage unit is kind of like finding a reliable landlord, except you only really get to deal with a storage company once or twice when you sign up and move. After that, hopefully, won't talk to them at all. You pay your rent, visit your storage unit when you need to get something or put something in, and that's all there is to it. However, there are some warning signs you should keep an eye on to make sure your relationship with your storage business is good. Decide on the type of storage unit you wanttzmash information about the things you plan to place in storage. You may already have an idea about the size of the storage unit you want to rent, but keep in mind that you don't want to just rent a storage unit that matches all your items, you a unit where you can fit yourself inside with a small space to work. If you ever want to be able to get your items out, you don't want to pack your storage space wall to the wall, floor to ceiling. Many people get the smallest the unit they can get to save money, and then wind up taking the empty side of it to get to the box that is behind. You're not that guy unless you know you're never going to need anything you put in. Do you have anything that is temperature sensitive? You may need a climate-controlled unit that is indoors rather than a general garage-style unit that is outdoors. Are your products valuable? You probably want a unit that has good security and supervision, and you definitely want insurance on your storage unit. Check and check if your tenant's insurance or homeowner insurance policy covers items in the storage unit. If not, see how much it will cost to add to it, or consider buying insurance from a storage facility. If you go with a large national or regional storage facility, they will probably offer it to their customers for a nominal fee. Have your HomeworkSy you said that you want to manage a storage unit, we are going to focus on how you can find storage buildings instead of home storage boxes sealed in boxes that you can't access if you want to go get your Christmas lights. First, don't get stuck on the storage facility closest to your home. Here are a few things to do before you even pick up the phone. Photo Stefan Andrej Shambora.Don't get stuck on the location. There is no faster way to find yourself storing your precious memory in a facility that sucks than get stuck working with one that just happens to be closest to you or the cheapest in your community. Cast your net wide enough for you to have a good handful of options that you can explore. After all, wouldn't you rather drive or walk for an extra 10 minutes to keep your belongings in a nicer location? Plus, if you live in a city or a very populated suburban area, you can store great deals by storing a little further from the city. Check out the feedback. Look up storage facilities for Google Sites and Yelp. You certainly want to make reviews with a grain of salt, but if they're all bad or there's a recurring theme, you can avoid being clear. Feedback can also give you insight into what you can keep an eye out for if you go visit a storage facility.Compare gates and opening hours. Several storage units only post their gate hours to make the location sound like it is open later than it actually is. Remember, there is a difference. Gate hours are usually hours in which you can access your storage unit, but opening hours are almost always shorter. If you have problems or talk to someone, you will only be able to solve problems during working hours. Also make sure that the gates and access hours are convenient for you. If your storage unit closes on Saturdays and Sundays Go Visit and Ask QuestionsNow that you know what you are looking for and you have some options, it is to view the storage locations you are considering. When you walk through the door, don't be forced to sign on to a dotted line right away, even if property management tries to tell you that the units are limited. Most companies will allow you to at least hold a unit overnight so you can think more. Take most of you to visit by looking around and asking questions instead. Ask property management if you can see the unit you actually receive. Whether at least a unit on the same floor or in the same area. Some storage facilities will show you a clean, 3rd floor unit, but actually rent you a messy, bug-infested basement one, so be opinionated if you have to, so you can see the unit representative one you actually sign. Ask if there are any rental specials or discounts available. Most storage companies will offer you the first month for free or for $1, which makes the transition from an old storage unit to a new one really easy (especially if you've already paid for the last month in the old unit), or if you want to move to a new unit a little less painful for the wallet. If they don't offer a special, don't worry, the next one you visit will probably be. Find out what happens if you miss a payment or miss a payment. In many places, storage units are not considered apartments. On the first day of the month, your rent is automatically delayed. Grace periods vary by company or even country, and in some cases even a few days late with your payment means that the contents of your unit can be auctioned to the highest bidder at a wholesale auction. The last storage unit I hired me for that scare tactic, and reminded me that I would always be on time or that the unit would be scheduled for auction, and I could be ingested by the daily late fee. Make sure you know what your storage unit policy is before you're stuck trying to do a wire transfer or pay online because you left the city without dropping off the check. Once you've seen the unit you're actually getting, and you have a good understanding of what you're getting into, ask the property manager if you can put the unit on hold if you like what you see. They may or may not, but do not apply to high pressure tactics. Even if you can't hold a unit, get a business card so you get back in touch with the person you met. Before signing, visit multiple locationsRead this process with multiple storage units in different locations before you call someone back and register for a specific unit of memory. See if you can make contracts at home with you review so you don't have to try to make sense of the legal document by standing in front of the property manager. After visiting multiple locations, reviewing all documents, and sending time to consider which storage space is most comfortable for you most suitable for your belongings, you can sign a contract or, better yet, — contract that allows you at any time. As we mentioned above, with luck you won't need the same kind of relationship with the storage unit as you have with the landlord, but you want to stash your belongings instead, you can trust with people you know will watch your property carefully to make sure it's not stolen or damaged. With a little homework and time to explore several options, you will find an affordable space that works for you. Good luck! Let's hear them in the comments below. Photo by Jarrod Lombardo. You can reach Alan Henry, author of this post, alan@lifehacker.com, or better yet, follow him on Twitter or Google+. Every year in December I change my mind the word I want to act as my mantra or guiding principle in the new year. The idea is focused around having a central word or topic to guide your actions or what you want to embrace over the next year. Instead of focusing on New Year's resolutions that don't stick, I'd like to focus on things that help me achieve my goals in a more cautious and holistic way. If I wanted to find more ways to become inspired, maybe I'd choose Inspiration as my name of the year. If I was looking for more ways to knock projects out of the park this coming year, maybe I'd choose the name Rockstar.The practice started in 2016 for me when I chose the word purpose as my name of the year. One of the problems of the year before is, while there was no shortage of opportunities, I was accepting each one without thinking about how it affects my workload or bottom line. I might've chosen the word focus as my name, but I chose the goal to remind me to achieve the specific goal I'd set. Every time the opportunity arose in 2016, I considered my name of the year and no matter how tempting it was to say yes, often, I said no. Since then, I have chosen a name, and this coming year it is calm. The word is not a passive or small key, as it can chant. It's meant to remind me not to get caught up in the chaos of the world and let it distract me from what's important. Several of my friends have asked me how I set my name for a year, and although it's different for everyone, here are five things I believe before my final decision. For many, every year there is a clean slate to accomplish a new set of goals. Last month I shared 20 questions to ask myself that could help set you up to achieve your goals in the new year. This exercise can also help you identify patterns that can lead to your name. Want more money in the new year? Do you want to introduce a new product? If most of your answers in a certain direction, then select a word to remind you of the in the new year and stick with it. Another group of friends get together during the holidays to create their Vision boards. Armed with dozens of magazines and ephemus, they collect images, phrases and words that they want to push over for the new year. Sounds like a reflection exercise, more often than not a pattern appears and your name of the year becomes obvious. Sometimes our name is harder to come by or not so obvious. In this case, brainstorm words that mean something to you or help get you to a place where your mind is less cluttered. Whenever I need to clear my head or need inspiration, I take my dog for a walk or find some green space. I could write down the greens, the dog, the walk, the air, the breathe, the connection, the peace, the calm ... you get a picture. It's a bit of a mind mapping process and thinking through time and space that's important for you to help you discover your name year. Once you come up with a few words, you really like it and feel like they can take you through the year, narrow them down to just five or three words and let them sit with you for a day or a week. Usually when I come up with my name, I just know it's my name. Still, I stay with it for a few days to make sure it reflects what I want to happen in the new year. Sometimes a word, I think, would be one turned into another, albeit similar, one. You should not hurry to come up with your name, but it is important to be wary of the process because the word is meant to help you. For some, simply announcing the name of others helps them own the same. Sounds like people share their phones with others to help them be responsible by sharing their name year with friends and family lets them know what is most important to you in the new year, and they can even help you achieve it.
