World s easiest game 2

Seth Preibatsch of Scvrgr gets a lot of attention at SXSW this week for his presentation entitled Game Layer on top of the world. He demonstrated some of his ideas by applying them to our education system, calling it a poorly designed game. His performance is a great duty to Jane McGonigal, who is a researcher in games and how they can be used to improve society. Her tag line and the title of her new book Reality is broken. Really? Is the game, used today by many to distract themselves from reality, going to help people create a new reality? Or said in a different way, should we put the game layer on the world? Don't get me wrong. I understand that the game is a huge industry. It's a game conversation that gives me pause. Putting the game layer on the world seems to me to be another shade of Happiness craze we are experiencing right now. Where the pursuit of happiness has become pressure to be happy and world problems should be spoon fed citizens like vitamins in steak for a dog. I'm curious what happens if Seth and Jane are locked in a room with Amy Chua. Yet I applaud what Seth and Jane are trying to do- discover ways to motivate people to take care of themselves, their families and their worlds. Most stimuli and behavioral studies will tell you, however, that no amount of external motivation will produce long-term, sustainable results, and that truly change someone's motivation behavior should come from within. Does it make sense to get there with games? While the game is an inherently motivated activity, the game offers to build that can actually take away from what people like Seth and Jane hope to achieve in society.
