Picture: NBC And I don't even know his last name! While these may be the lyrics of country singer Carrie Underwood, let's hope this isn't the case for you! Tv story has introduced viewers around the world to some of the most iconic characters, and unless they go by a mononym like singers Beyonce, Adele or Rihanna, they're going to have a last name! From popular TV shows like Friends, Breaking Bad and Game of Thrones, can you mention the TV show's last name? As for your first and last name, your first name often takes precedence and importance over your last one. While many countries in the world have your last name after, this is not true for many countries in the Orient. Countries like Japan, China and Korea value their family so much that the classic surname actually appears first. Their citizens are first recognized by their surname before their individual. Alternatively in this quiz, you must recognize the character by your first name before giving your last name. Popular TV families include seavers and Keatons in the 80s, Tanners and Banks of the 90s, and bluths and griffins of the 21st century. When it comes to recognizing some of TV's most popular characters, can you pair them to their last name? From Rachel in Friends to Walter of Breaking Bad, let's see if you come first in guessing these last names! It's just a genre of TELEVISION that gives viewers both of these things, and that's the situation of comedy. Sitcoms are exactly what they sound like. An entire show is based on an off the wall situation (it will want an ex-baseball player to open a bar or four ladies in their golden years living together). In addition, sitcoms are filled with characters that are snappy and play each other. Since the beginning of television, there have been hundreds of attempts at sitcoms, and those gaining traction tend to last for years or even stretch over decades. These shows are remembered years after they are cancelled, and they find their way into syndication and can be found on different networks at different times ... help them get even more ground. If you're an avid viewer, you've probably come across at least one sitcom that you just love to watch, and maybe one that you seek out when it's out of the air. But if you're a sitcom-a-holic, you can probably mention all these sitcoms we've chosen if we tell you three character names. Take this quiz to see where you land on the spectrum. Hazel called his boss Mr. B, so Rosie called George Jetson Mr. J. YouTubeKrusty the Clown When Simpsons creator Matt Groening was a child in Portland, Oregon, in the 1960s, he often saw a gravelly, world-weary TV clown named Rusty Nails. He was actually a very cute clown, groening says, with an incredibly scary name. YouTubeRugrats In 1991, comic book producer Arlene Klasky had one day come up with a new series for Nickelodeon. She and her writing partner, Paul Germain, had some ideas, but nothing worked. Then Klasky looked at his baby and wrote a few things down in his notebook. Then I called Paul and just read my notes, 'If babies could talk, what would they say?' The next day they gave the idea to Nickelodeon... and Rugrats was born. YouTubeButt-Head When the animator Mike Judge was in college, he lived next door to a 12-year-old boy who called himself Iron-Butt. The referee remembers: Apparently you can kick him in the ass as hard as you wanted, and it wouldn't hurt him. A troublemaker, Iron-Butt used to sneak into the judge's house and once burned down a tree. He became the inspiration for Beavis's friend, Butt-head.YouTubeDexter's Laboratory For an animation project at an art institute in 1992, the budding artist Genndy Tartakovsky designed a tall, gooty ballerina. He thought she needed a nemesis, and drew a nerdy little boy with big glasses. Tartakovsky decided that the boy was a brilliant scientist, just like his own older brother. But the mischievous ballerina, called Dee Dee, was modelled on Tartakovsky himself. When he was young, he annoys his brother by messing with all his scientific equipment. Tartakovsky built Dexter's Laboratory, which premiered in 1995, around the duo. Looking for more amazing facts and good laughs?
