It's not a chronological story, but it's written as if the incident happened on the wheel, with everything coming together at the center. The result is that the structure of the story is difficult to analyze and makes sense as a whole. [3] The story was first published in the June 1968 issue of The Beast, [3][4] and compiled ellison's short story was the first story of a beast shouting love at the heart of the world in 1969. Edited by Robert Silverberg, in 1969, [5] Hugo Winner: Volume One and Two, edited by Isaac Asimov, in 1971, [6] and part of Ellison's retro collection, Edgeworks 4, was published in 1979. A summary of the story includes many unrelated topics told in well-versed lectures, eventually connecting them with mentions and details. Topics can be categorized as: events on Earth, events in alien communities known as Concord, and descriptions of non-physical concepts. One man, William Shirok, went to kill him. He poisoned 200 people with insecticide stolen from a pest control man, killed hundreds on a jet flight using a time bomb planted in his mother's suitcase and shot 44 people in the stadium with machine guns before he was arrested. In the presumption that the distant future travels from Earth, discover a new planet with a statue of 37 feet (11 meters) tall. The statue has an alien face, but this beatific figure wears a toga and captures strange objects, describing the expression of the statue as it was when Sterog had it when a judge sentenced him to death in his final court trial. The lecture describes a concept called Crosswhen, which is described as a possibility, resulting in distance and time, all beyond the human mind. Next, a fierce and crazy seven-headed dragon is captured and drained using a technique invented by an alien man named Semph The Dragon being described as a crosswhen with another story called Mad Men. Subtitles make it vague whether mad or not, and Dragons are two different species, or maybe two different consciousnesses of the same mind. Semph argues that drainage, Semph argues that drainage affects others, while Linah argues on behalf of a community known as Concord, arguing that it is a necessary risk to ensure their own survival, despite the cost of others. Then Semph revealed that he had sent the drainage side (of dangerous essence) elsewhere, not in the tank as planned. He shows these elements as part of an unexplained field, and Lenah panics, wanting to know where it was sent. The next thread is very short. It mentions the word: Djam Karet (roughly translated as hours of stretches[2]) used throughout the next thread. The details of the meeting were uncertain, but the result was that Attila did not attack Rome, as he did with other cities. The narrative that the city was attacked forty years ago by Alaric the Goth and three years later by King Gaiseric subtitled refers to the connection of these actions (and the inactivity of Attila) connected to perform for his actions during drainage. In the last conversation with Linah, the nature of drainage is revealed with the extraction and condensation of irrationality in a vapor-like form from the organism. Ai is often sent out outside the domain of Concorde (called zero) and sent elsewhere (called out there), while Semph resists this protocol for the possibility that it affects other races (such as people on Earth) Linah side by side with it to protect Concorde. The field mentioned earlier is a metaphysical agency that pulses with violence and mania; Traditionally, after the executions, Linah erected a memorial for Semph, which implied that it was a previously mentioned statue. The final thread involves a near-mad man who finds a box in the ruins of a German city on Earth as he searches for food. He opened the box, releasing a wisp of purple intense smoke in the air, presumably to vaporize. The next day, World War 4 begins. [8] The short story reception has been called an astonishingly effective meditation on the nature of evil. [8] It is one of the stories that signals Ellison's development into a thoughtful and mature fantasy. Other media inventor Harlan Ellison plotted the story for Marvel Comics' The Incredible Hulk, the #140 issue (June 1971), under the title: Brute who shouted love at the heart of Atom. The title of the first half of episode 26 of Neon Genesis Evangelion is called the beast that shouts at me at the heart of the world世 (世を叫 of the english language I point to the key plot of the adventure game, yu-no picture novel: young women who love the boundaries of this world are based on this story.
