Choosing the right size table is based on the combination of rider height, weight and boot, but mainly on weight and boot size. Many riders think they want the height of their board to be from the chin of the bridge's nose. Alone, it's a very simplistic way to assess board size - your board doesn't know how tall you are, but it can tell you how much you weigh, as they say. If you're planning on riding more freestyle (spinning, jibbing, hitting freestyle features) you may want a slightly shorter board, and if you're going to ride more freeride (big mountains, fast, loading turns) you might want a slightly longer board. The weight range, found on all Burton boards and the size of the chart for each model Burton.com, is a recommendation and quite open, but is the best way to decide what size of the ride if you don't know what kind of riding you want to do (or you do it all). Riders fall either on the heavier side or on the lighter side of the recommended range. If you have a harder side, I know that the board will feel softer, and if you're on the lighter side, I know that the board will feel stiffer. When you're in the middle, it bends just when our engineers design it. Another important piece of the puzzle is your boot size and how it affects the need for a wide board. Read more about it here. If you're out of the weight range don't worry, just know the feeling of the board may be a little different than advertised.
