tinkerbell91 Messages: 1 Joined: February 2010 I had a brain tumor when I was 14. I'm 18 now and I'm in college. I was asked to do a survivor's ceremony for the relay, but none of my college friends know I had cancer. I tend to keep this to myself, and my other friends from camp and stuff have no problem sharing and you posted it on their facebook. Why is it so hard for me to handle this? Hinterhaus Productions/Taxi/Getty Images If you're deaf or bad to hear, you may know that not long ago, making a simple phone call was a real problem. If you are lucky, you have lived in an area with volunteer relay services. But it can take hours to make a phone call because of the long queue of subscribers ahead of you. When there was no relay service for the deaf, you had to rely on the kindness of hearing friends or relatives. That changed after the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), passed in 1990, authorized the creation of a nationwide Telecommunications Relay Service (TRS) for people with hearing or speech impairments. TRS is regulated by the Federal Communications Commission (FCC). Today, this relay is available in all 50 states, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, and the U.S. territories for both local and long-distance calls. The service is free for its users, with costs covered either by the state or by a federal source of funding. There are two types of relay services: traditional and broadband, high-speed video. Traditional relay services have all messages only in text, via teletyter (TTY) or over the Internet. The video service uses a video or webcam and a sign language interpreter. Almost all relay services include an operator called a communications assistant who transmits the contents of the call back and forth between subscribers. Using phone, you can access the traditional relay service 24 hours a day, 7 days a week, dialing either 711 or a toll-free number. (The FCC has a 711 newsletter to communicate with the relay service.) Each state has its own relay service. Access to the online relay service can be accessed through the service's relay service website instant messaging. Video relays are available by contacting the relay via a video phone such as Vice President (Sorenson) or Ojo (Snap! VRS). Some mobile phones may have free software installed to contact relay services without the use of instant messaging. Internet text relay services offer secure online communication. Most of them have features such as the ability to save the conversation as an HTML file and the ability to adjust the font size and background or color of the text. Web services can offer separate chat boxes for the caller and communications assistant, as well as emojis. Instant messaging services also allow you to save instant messaging conversations. Spanish translation is also available. Some deaf people, especially experienced American Sign Language (ASL) users, say that relay calls through gesture video streaming services are faster and more efficient. A number of companies offer relay services. The examples below, not the full list, are included. Most repeaters offer multiple options (web, traditional and video). There's also a Federal Service video relay, for federal employees (FedRelay). Some wireless relay services (from Sprint Relay, IP Relay and Hamilton Relay) do not use instant messages. Instead, the app is downloaded or installed on a mobile phone. The FCC requires relay service providers to assign their deaf and visually impaired users a single universal 10-digit phone number. Having normal phone numbers has proven to be extremely helpful for deaf people, as it allows you to hear people to call deaf people directly. She helped Deaf job seekers by allowing them to list the actual phone number on their resumes. (Before the FCC's requirement was published, some relay service providers provided their users with personal phone numbers or 800 numbers.) The relay conference subtitles a service that allows deaf people to participate in conference calls, reducing the need for interpreters at meetings. There is a Federal Relay Conference Signature Service and Commercial, available through Sprint Relay. People who have some residual hearing and can speak clearly can use phone subtitles. It's not suitable for deaf people. The Phone Signature service (CapTel) is similar to a voice service (a type of relay that allows you to use your voice to talk and use a relay for what you can't hear). CapTel uses a special phone with a text screen to display the almost instant print of the signature of what the caller is saying. CapTel can hear and read words at the same time. No Public. One of the problems faced by users of relay services for the deaf is that the public, which is largely unaware of the existence of relay services. The services tried to raise awareness through advertisements and advertisements about public services. However, it is still common for man to hang up on the user's deaf relay after hearing only a few words. Why? Because they think the caller is trying to sell something. The Deaf community pays the price when it happens. Communications assistants usually give a brief speech explaining the baton when people hear at the beginning of a call, and this is what might sound like a sales pitch. One solution is to instruct the communications assistant not to announce it as a relay call before making a call. Because of the more direct nature of sign language relay calling, sign language video relay services are said to minimize hanging problems. Criminal abuse of relay services. Relay services were also abused by criminals who had already used relay services to get goods delivered without actually paying for them. This has made some merchants hesitant to take relay credit card orders. Orders. transformer protection relay setting calculation guide pdf
