They arrive armed with measuring equipment and warm clothes - the weather conditions on Lake Baikal are relentless. With the GT-R properly heated, they set out to break the Russian-made speed record on natural ice. GT-R, storming the deep-green surface. It is a speed record for sure, for the production of the car, but only for Russia - previously the speed record was launched on the Baltic Sea ice by Finnish rally champion Juha Kankkunen in 2007 and 2011, and reached speeds of 199.83 mph and 205.48 mph respectively, with the Bentley Bentley as a GT weapon. And as recently as March this year, Finn Janne Laitinen managed to top that with a reading of 208.6 mph or 335 km/h, driving a Nokian under the auspices of an Audi RS6. Crazy speeds on ice - and Nissan still has some way to go to break those. However, the video is exhilarating to watch. Check out the video recording of the Audi run as well, while you're at it.
