By their second year, students may know that they are heading to a political science major, honors, combined major, or Minor program, and therefore should begin to focus their interests in specific areas of discipline. Each of the 200 level courses provides an introduction to questions, language and analysis in each of the four broad subfields, building on the underlying concepts acquired in the POLI 100. Students who will prepare 200 level courses will be well prepared to take top-level courses in specific fields of political science. Studying Political Science Abroad: Students interested in studying on board in their 3rd year should consult with the UBC Go Global Program for the second year. Subfield Summary of Canadian Policy Knowledge of Canadian Institutions and Models of Canadian Politics and Government matters to those whose careers will take them to public service, law, journalism, business, social work, or management consulting. Comparative Politics There is a fascinating variety of political systems and institutions around the world. Studying how these systems and institutions differ between places and periods of time is not only inherently interesting, but also gives us an opportunity to answer important questions about how the political world works. By comparing different political systems or institutions, we can learn, for example, which political systems best to channel the preferences of their citizens or to produce good policies, or what conditions give what gives democracy and strong states. By studying individual countries or regions in depth, we can learn about how political processes unfold over time and how they shape important social, political and economic outcomes. POLI220 - Introduction to Comparative Policy This course introduces students to the field of comparative politics and focuses on several broad topics: comparative analysis, state, nation and society, political regimes, markets and development. Within these themes, learn about state development, state failure, nationalism, ethnic conflicts and civil war, democracy and its political institutions, political culture, welfare states and inequality, globalization and development. These topics are being studied through a set of case studies that include both developed democracies and developing countries. POLI 220 prepares students for top-level courses in comparative politics. Click here for POLI 220 Learning Goals political theory How do we live together on earth? How should we organize ourselves? What are the consequences for justice, freedom, equality, happiness - different approaches to living together? In political theory, we evaluate actual practices, their value and possible alternatives. We get a reflexive view of key political concepts such as freedom, power, equality, oppression, domination and justice, and we use such concepts to think about real practices and structures, including democracy, capitalism, colonialism, empire, gender, race and law. Studying political theory will develop you as a person, helping you to explore yourself, and it will cultivate your critical abilities as a citizen. POLI240 - Currents of Political Thought This course allows students to acquire skills to conduct a detailed analysis of political ideas. The course introduces students to some of the key thinkers in the history of political thought, and explores how their ideas contributed to the evolution of Western political practice. POLI 240 prepares students for advanced coursework on various topics of political philosophy. Click for POLI 240 Learning Targets International Relations International System covers all different relationships and actions between states and non-state actors. Understanding events, norms and trends in international politics requires a certain set of theoretical, analytical and empirical tools. The study of international relations, based on the history of the international system, points us to predictions about great models of peace, conflict and trade in our world. POLI260 - Introduction to Global Politics This course introduces students to the tools used to understand the international system and global politics. Students explore basic concepts and approaches in an academic study of international politics (or global politics or international relations). The course covers the basic history of the international system and the characteristics of the major institutions through which global politics is played out. The main issues addressed in this course include the causes of war and peace, security and insecurity, the model of global trade, the power of the institutions of global governance, development and the dissemination of international norms.
