Skip over streaming content allows you to see what you want when you want. But with so many product offerings including smart TVs, streaming devices, and apps, there's no one perfect way to get that content delivered. Here's a look at some of the best options. Once upon a time, if you wanted to watch a movie, you went to the theater and sat in a cozy chair in front of a mega screen. As the years passed, those movies became viewable at home via laser discs, VHS tapes and later DVDs. But today, media buffs can happily get on with streaming ever after. The on-demand trend has become so popular that millions of American households are dropping cable or satellite service and instead, relying on smart TVs, streaming devices, and apps to catch up that television show should watch whenever — and wherever — it's most convenient. Although streaming has been around for a few years, new product offerings and services make decisions difficult. Before subscribing to the streaming service, buying a device, or investing in a smart TV, make sure this way of working is a good match for your home and life. Key highlights: Is the system compatible with other products you already have, including Android, iOS devices, Apple Mobile or gaming consoles? Do you need to store content, and if so, how much space is available? What apps are compatible with your device? And finally, and perhaps most importantly, is your favorite regular programming available on your streaming service? The list of television programmes and films keeps changing. There are an increasing number of ways users can stream content on their televisions. Smart TVs allow you to stream programs without a different device or product. Just a few clicks and you can binge on the latest hot television show or dig deep into the archives for the entire season of classic TV shows. If you're not in the market for a new television, there are other ways to stream content. Amazon's Fire TV Player lets you use voice commands to find content. Apple TV can stream from iTunes, which makes sense to die-hard Apple enthusiasts. If you have gamers in your home, PS4 can do video streaming, double-duty from some apps. It also offers the benefit of blu-ray player. Xbox One also streams content from Netflix and other apps. Roku Box or their latest offering, Streaming Stick, offers another way to view content with over 1,000 channels and 31,000 movies. Samsung Smart Media Player offers programming from more than 100 apps but not from Hulu. Google Chromecast is affordable, easy to install, and works like a thumb drive. There are even more tools and products on the market to help you stream content. To achieve a combination of products and services that work best for you Be sure to do homework.
