Learn TO MOTIVATE When you speak! Let's start from the beginning.1. What is your life experience? If you want to learn to be a motivational speaker, you first have to figure out what you're going to say. The best place to start looking is your own life. Make a list of the goals you've fulfilled and the accomplishments you've earned. For example, graduating from college, landing your first job, overcoming drugs, or even achieving a dream for life. If you just happen to be the best-selling author or Olympic medalist, then this will certainly add to your credibility, however, there was no need to provide material for speeches. 2. What can you offer? Second, you have to determine what you can offer. Fortunately, everyday goals can be used in providing material such as quitting smoking, overcoming addiction, finally getting your anger under control, weight loss. On the negative side, maybe you were in a drunken driving accident. Talk about how it changed your life and the struggles you had to endure. Talk about how you overcame adversity and how you pushed hard to get through it. Pour your heart on the table for the audience; they love to connect to the emotions that you offer. 3. Go to the base! It's really hard for people to believe you when you say: I can solve all your problems. This is a step where you have to get serious. It's time to find your niche. You have to figure out your specialty, whether it's leadership or perseverance, etc., because people tend to be more willing to listen if the speaker (you) has ownership experience about them. In other words, if you know what you're talking about and you show your intelligence, people are more willing to listen to what you're saying. 4. Know what to say before they hear it. You need to know your audience. Depending on what type of niche you choose, you can characterize your audience according to: age, gender, location, interests, or any other traits like religion and culture. Once it's organized you can figure out how to aim your efforts to where the audience feels as if your speech is speaking to them individually. Motivation comes from faith, and faith comes from the heart. Make sure you touch their hearts. Build a structure. It's time to start writing your speech. The best way to organize a speech is to first sketch your speech. Then check out the key points in your speech and make sure you stay on topic. To preview what your plan should look like feel free to click on the link labeled contour. 6. Fill in Kew. Once you make the skeleton of your plan for your speech, it's time to fill in the gaps in the various sections of your speech with support for ideas and details. What ideas ideas do you have what you can tell the audience to support your highlights in the speech? Also make sure you have examples and anecdotes you can share with your audience to prove your struggle. If your speech is particularly long, don't be afraid to use humor! Throw in a few jokes and make the audience smile, because comedic relief is the best way for the audience to forget their problems. Last but not least, make sure you have the visuals before, during and after your speech to give the audience a better understanding of what you've gone through. A great example of a visual can be a home video of yourself, or even a photo to show where you came from and what you achieved (before and after). 7. Remember and shake the cobwebs. Once you've finished your speech, remember it. Once you have memorized it, there is no need for you to look at notecards or a screen that gives you the opportunity to have eye contact with your audience. This is extremely useful for your speech because you not only can make the audience feel like you are talking to them one-on-one, but at the same time gives you the momentum you need to be exciting and bring personality to the stage. It's okay to get nervous at the beginning, but as a motivational speaker it's your job not to show it off. For new speakers: if you need help learning how to talk, you can find your local Toastmasters closest to your neighborhood. Toastmasters is an international non-profit organization that helps people practice conversational skills at weekly meetings. Once you feel comfortable with your abilities and prepared speech, don't be afraid to start booking concerts. While practicing at home is great, there is no comparison with putting on a real show for real people. There is no substitute for experience, so get out there and give strength motivation to people who need it. Now that's how you write your speech. - Don't give up, never give up - Jimmy W. Own the stage. You have to understand that you are not a sage on stage. You're a performer, and if you want to talk with motivational success you have to put on a great show, otherwise the audience will feel as if you've wasted your time. You are the star of the show, so you have to practice, practice and practice. - Keep it simple - When you talk to an audience, don't try to develop brain confidence. Keep your message simple and strong. - Never let your audience forget their niche. genreanalysis.docxFile Size: 121 kbFile Type: docxDownload File Motivational Speech OutlineGoal: To convince the audience to take steps to improveOpsener and IntroductionCredibility - the audience must believe what you sayConvince - Convince the audience that there is a problem that needs to be addressed Ideas to Solve the ProblemCondition Repeat the main arguments in favor of the subjectAlternatives - Discuss alternatives, if no action is takenConclusion - Come out with a positive statementClick the following link for more information: Motivational speechNext Slide on Speech Writing It usually takes more than three weeks to write a good impromptu speech. That's why TED talk is so popular. We love to learn from other people's experiences. When we feel low, a small bout of motivational medication may be enough to lift someone in and out of their downturn. If you have been tasked with this wonderful opportunity, we hope that these five steps to writing a motivational speech will help you draw in the crowd and start changing lives, one truth at a time. Have you ever listened to someone speak, and although they were quite affable, wondered, What are they talking about? The problem is that they probably weren't super clear themselves about the message they wanted to deliver. Thus, the first step is to write a motivational speech to have a clear and concise message. You can compare it to a thesis statement essay. It is one sentence that defines everything else that is in the future. If you can focus on that one, the central focus, then you can direct every subsequent moment back into this basic motivational idea. If you consider some of the most famous motivational speakers in the world, you will notice that each of their speeches has one central theme. They do not speak a few topics in special speeches; they focus on one powerful thought. Tony Robbins has been transforming life over the years. Look at his catalog of videos on his website. This is the one single message on the video, and each one is absolutely compelling. Of all the Your opening lines are the most important. A good hook is crucial to your success. You can be cute. You can have a lot of energy, but if you don't say something to soar your ears in the crowd, you lost them even before you started. To help with this, check how to write a hook. This will reemphasize the power hook and help you project your own.3 Share Narrative There are several ways to really connect with your audience. First, it's eye contact. As you move around the room, it's so important to constantly scan the crowd and make the audience feel as if you're talking to them directly. When scanning a crowd, share a personal narrative or two. Think of it as a conversation between friends. We are all interconnected on one level or another. Sharing a personal narrative will help you establish this connection in a way that simple facts and figures can't. Let's look at these examples of narrative essays. Although they are designed for written words, you can see how a single moving snippet is enough to move the entire audience.4. Keep the audience in MindIf you consider the word motivation, it implies the action of some kind. This means that your motivational speech cannot be focused on yourself. Rather, you have to be the driving force that motivates the audience to do something. Think of your speech as a two-side street. Ask rhetorical questions whenever possible. Simply put, you never want to focus on yourself, your testimony, or your narratives. Rather, you want to keep the audience as the main focus. Will they understand what you're saying? Can they relate to your stories? Do you give them enough examples to encourage them to come out and make changes? As an added bonus, keeping the focus on them (rather than you) will help keep your nervousness at bay. For more information on the subject, check out these speech tips. They will help you bring down any anxieties you may have and organize irresistible speech.5. Conclude with a forced ThoughtLike hook, the way you close is also important. We humans are so fickle and distracted that it is possible that your audience will leave the room and forget everything you just said. But, you can stay with them if you can close in a way that lingers in their mind. Ask them to take action. Ask them to go beyond their busy lives and do something special for them. Or you can just ask a rhetorical question that they can answer in their own minds. Motivational speech is a convincing speech. You want to promote some kind of positive change. To help you along, check out these steps for persuasive speech. They will help you pull all your thoughts together in a cohesive, but compelling, train of thought. An example of motivational speech, who among us does not think about the meaning of life from time to time. Wayne Dyer is another motivational motivational which pulled people out of the depths of despair and into hopeful, wonderful lives. If you look at one of his videos on the truth about miracles, you notice it ends as a call to action (Take my online seminar) and resonates the truth (I light). These last words will stick with people and probably propel them towards some kind of action. For more on how to structure your speech, consider imitating our plan below. Use it as a template to help you gather your thoughts and make basic waves.5 Steps to writing Motivational SpeechView - Download PDF! Am LightWayne Dyer said what's best. You're light. Wherever you go, you can choose the light in the room. Spreading positivity. Let people know that they can achieve the mission of their lives. Best of all, you don't have to work on what to say. Just pick one thing and build from there. The less your speech resembles a cobweb, the more people you will touch. To help you stay on track, take a look at these quick examples of keyword sketches. The keyword outline will be your best friend when you are there on stage. It's an encouraging little piece of paper that lets you know that you're, indeed, being light.5 Steps to writing a motivational speech speech motivational speech outline example. motivational speech outline format. motivational speech outline template. motivational speech outline pdf. how to write a motivational speech outline. monroe's motivational speech outline. motivational speech topics and outlines
