Want a sure way to ruin the night in the symphony? Try sucking every available moment before the conductor lifts the baton unsuccessfully to convince the stubborn fellow rocker that Sturgill Simpson is not a (cough, cough) country artist. Yes, the 37-year-old Nashville-on-the-road-out-of-Kentucky transplant possesses a deep throat stretching easily bouncing between whim and danger - the kind that makes you weak in your knees and prone to hasty decisions. And, yes, the steel guitar pedal oozes in every crack of its material like chocolate syrup, showing a bowl of vanilla ice cream that the boss has. Hell, Simpson himself told Rolling Stone: I'm never going to do anything but country recording. As soon as I open my mouth, it'll be a country song. But, the Grammy nominee is running circles around any other performer in the genre with his diabolical punk attitude. That's why his 2014 breakthrough Metamodern Sounds in Country Music is awash with psychedelia and rockabilly. This fluid configuration of musical styles is even more pronounced at his long-awaited follow-up, Sailor's Guide to Earth, where gritty Skynyrd rock makes with tarnished Memphis soul while hip-swiveling Elvis plays the hall monitor. The slap of Simpson with the universal label misses the moment. Just look at his exciting cover of Nirvana In Bloom for confirmation. Simpson produced the record himself - his first for a major label - in Nashville, getting his sea legs in the fatherhood department, which adds to the album's isolated narrative. For the first time, parents rarely admit, in between the flow of children's photos posted on Facebook, just how transformative and lonely what life in the world can feel. This first year is a period of intense joy and fear, emphasizing both the majestic possibilities of the world and its brutal truths. It's the cosmic thing that Simpson captures in a nine-track song cycle where he addresses his son directly on everything from car maintenance to addiction. Keep It Between the Lines buries a guide to living a happy and healthy life under a stream of skronking horns and a brilliant organ, courtesy of Dap-Kings and Simpson's regular bandmate Bobby Emmett. In the interview, Simpson doesn't shy away from the naughty past that led him - starving for structure - to join the Navy before settling on the songs. So he comes across as a bit wishful thinking when he leads his son to the straight and narrow. Keep your head out of the clouds / And don't forget to be kind, he suggests. And just stay in school / Stay away from drugs / And keep between the lines. He knows that these nuggets of wisdom will probably go unheeded, but damned if he's not going to try with a phrase every father uttered at least once: Do as I say/ Don't do as I did. Leading Brace Brace Impact (Live a Little) lives up to its name thanks to Laur Joamets' rolling guitar and irresistible swampy groove, giving the sad reality that time is limited, so you better go out there and kick it out. Welcome to Earth (Pollywog) doles of government rows best reserved for a decent night in heels, before a rogue in the middle with Amy Winehouse-worthy strut that sympathizes with the plight of working parents. The moaning pedals of the steel guitar mimics the ceremonial call of seagulls on the melancholy Breakers Roar, which gently lays out the tools to overcome a depressive episode. But the lessons of the album don't just come in the queues of human soul calisthenics or bumping bravado. All Around You is immersed in the Staple Singers tradition in both music and message. Lush, horns bathed in bouncy conversation for the lowest of low times, the song gives up control of something bigger than Simpson. God is inside you, all around you and above / Glowing, showing you the way he roars, offering a path to a perfect world. The fiery album Closer Call To Arms is a screed against the power, with special attention paid to the military. As a former Navy man and new parent, Simpson's dot protest is not enough. A monstrous storm of creaking horns, a roadhouse guitar and hyper-keys accentuate his furor. He releases a squawk like a crowing Peter Pan before spitting out steel codes through gritted teeth: Bullshit on TV/Bullshit on the radio/Hollywood tells me how to be/bullshit should go. Written for one happy boy, Sailor's Guide to Earth also welcomes unmarried, barren, abandoned and middle-aged with unconditional love. If Father's Day is just another Sunday, let Simpson be your confidant. It was announced on March 3, 2016, with the release of the single Brace for Impact (Live a Little). The album was released on April 15, 2016, and won best country album at the 59th Grammy Awards; he was also nominated for Album of the Year. On the eve of the album's announcement, Simpson said in an interview with G that what will happen next It's over... Honestly, I need about six months at home with my family. On March 3, 2016, Simpson posted on YouTube and on his website, Brace for Impact (Live a Little). the next day he released a list of nine songs on the track-list guide sailor to Earth. A week later, he released a music video for Brace for Impact, directed by Matt Mahurin, as well as Grim Reaper, a hot rod coffin and sailboats. On March 24, 2016, Simpson released Nirvana's cover album In Bloom along with a music video also shot by Matt Mahurin. Simpson said, I wanted to make a very beautiful and pure reverence for Kurt (Cobain). The album was released on the official NPR website on April 7, 2016. The song Oh Sarah was previously recorded by Simpson's former band Sunday Valley and appeared on their only full-length album, To the Wind and On To Heaven, in 2011.
