Reality tv show treatment

Sometimes Lifetime almost seems to be trying to earn the title of television's most offensive network. The network has become known for doing bland biopics about dead celebrities without anyone's permission, and is now introducing a reality show that sounds like one of the most terrible ideas ever to come to reality tv. Let it sink for a second. Lifetime Born in the Wild's new show will follow mothers who choose to have natural births in the desert. The show was presented to reporters at the Television Critics Association, where producer Yoshi Stone said it was just another birth show for Deadline. It is a powerful human event; you can't run out of that argument. The pilot episode will document the birth at home of her mother Audrey Bird, who lives in a cabin in a remote area of Alaska. The trailer glamorizes the danger of giving birth in a place away from power lines, sewer systems and medical assistance. The show will focus on mothers who have their babies with very little medical care, in places where it would be difficult to get medical care if something went wrong during the birth process. Journalists at the CTA panel asked about the ethics of making a show where such danger is inherent. We know that natural births are a hot problem in America. It is a continuous and heated debate. At the end of the day, everyone is allowed to make their own choices. We're documenting people who are making a particular choice, Stone said. He then outlined the show's various plans to avoid the ethical grey area as much as possible. He said that during the filming of the pilot of the series, there was a lot of medical supplies on site and Medevac was on guard. The team was prepared with oxygen and tools for possible bleeding. We live in the middle of nowhere, so this was a domestic birth for us, Bird told the audience. This is far from the first time the network has aired questionable material. Life was in the news last year for biopics about Brittany Murphy, Whitney Houston and Aaliyah that were made without the permission of the families of those deceased celebrities. The network has moved forward with each of these projects despite very explicit condemnations from all the families of the subjects. This tactic manages to bring the films to the headlines, but only for very negative reasons. Perhaps the old adage all the press is good press has bred for Lifetime, as bad press is already piling up for Born in the Wild. Some wondered if the show could encourage viewers at home to attempt the same extreme natural birth methods with their own deliveries, according to an article by Yahoo Lifestyle. There been some pretty bland reality shows made on a variety of networks, but Born in the Wild seems to have taken the cake in terms of ethical ethics the cashed-up factor of very graphic birth scenes, and having the life of newborns poised. But the fact that we are talking about how ridiculous it is could simply stimulate more to look. Follow Jacqueline on Twitter @Jacqui_WSCS more from Entertainment Cheat Sheet: Sheet:
