Get ready to let your mind completely and completely blown away... At one point he was in his office, seven words in the twenty-fifth part of the final chapter of his new book, and the darkness rained on them, and the next he was dead. Tragic loss, his mind echoed numb as he slipped away. Relatives and acquaintances attended the funeral, but not many friends. Gordon was not a well-liked figure in the publishing world, because although the books he wrote - tales of horror and magic and surprise - regularly reared his head on bestseller lists, he had an offensive habit of insulting people without realizing it, then laughing at their shock. It was at Gordon's funeral, however, that Stephanie Edgeley first saw the gentleman in a tan coat. He stood under the shadow of a large tree, away from the crowd, his coat buttoned all the way, despite the warmth of the day. The scarf was wrapped around the bottom half of his face, and even with her position on the far side of the grave, Stephanie could work out the wild and curly hair that escaped from the wide-brimmed hat he wore low over his giant sunglasses. She watched him, intrigued by his appearance. And then, as he knew he was being watched, he turned and walked back through the rows of tombstones and disappeared from view. After the service, Stephanie and her parents headed back to their dead uncle's house, across a humpback bridge and along a narrow road that carved its way through a dense forest. The gates were heavy and great and stood open, welcoming them to the estate. The grounds were huge and the old house itself was ridiculously large. There was an extra door in the living room, a door disguised as a bookcase, and when she was younger, Stephanie liked to think that no one else knew about the door, not even Gordon himself. It was a secret passage, as in the stories she read, and make up adventures about haunted houses and smuggled treasures. This secret passage will always be her escape route, and the imaginary villains in these adventures will be dumbfounded by her sudden and mysterious disappearance. But now this door, this secret passage, stood open, and through it there was a constant stream of people, and she was saddened that this little piece of magic had been taken from her. Tea was served and drinks were poured and small sandwiches were handed around on silver trays, and Stephanie watched the mourners casually ap-praise their surroundings. The main topic of the hushed conversation was will. Gordon was not a man who was dotted, or even demonstrated any great affection, so no one could have predicted who would inherit his considerable fortune. Stephanie could see greed boiling in the watery eyes of her father's other brother, a horrible little man named Fergus, as he nodded sadly and spoke grimly and pocketed silverware when he thought no one was looking. Fergus's wife was a very dissatisfied, witty woman named Beryl. She drifted through the crowd, deep in unconvincing grief, peeping for gossip and digging for scandal. Her daughters did their best to ignore Stephanie. Carol and Crystal were twins, fifteen years old and sour and vindictive as their parents. While Stephanie was dark-haired, tall, slender and strong, they were a bottle blonde, stumpy, and dressed in clothes that made them bulge in all the wrong places. Apart from brown eyes, no one would have guessed that the twins were related to her. She loved it. It was the only thing she liked about them. She left them on their small glare and snide whispers, and went for a walk. The corridors of her uncle's house were long and lined with paintings. The floor underfoot was wooden, polished to the brilliance, and the house smelled of age. Not so stuffy, exactly, but... Experienced. These walls and these floors saw a lot in their time, and Stephanie was nothing short of a faint whisper for them. Here's an instant, the next one passed. 1 2 The above is taken from Skulduggery Pleasant by Derek Landy. All rights are reserved.
