Difference between mood theme and tone

To answer the title question, the tone is how the author feels, the mood is how the author makes the reader feel, and the subject is the main meaning or basic idea of the literary work. If that's all you wanted to know, then well you can leave now, thank you for coming though, but note that you clicked on the article, and usually the articles are longer than the sentence, so you can assume we're going to ruin it even more for you. And not only because we want the article to be longer and more impressive, because the quantity is not necessarily of the same quality, but because we want to help you better understand how to use these literary instruments in your future or current works. We hope that you will learn something new, and now that the mandatory introductions are done, let's start the article. What is a literary device? When the author writes a story, there are some things to throw in to make history a little touched on life, these things are called literary instruments. There are hundreds of literary devices, and we could hardly list them all, but listing a few that you may know are personification where you give human feelings to dead objects, metaphors and similes that both compare one thing to another, but in many ways, there is also foreshadowing, where you give subtle clues throughout history that leads to something to reveal. Hopefully you already knew what those things were, but if you don't then don't worry, we're writing about some of their future articles. Tone, mood and theme are all literary devices that authors use to give a little more pizza to their story, but these literary devices have some similarities in how they work in writing, meaning they all try to make the reader feel a certain path to something, which is one of the most important parts of the story. Making these 3 devices very important to learn early because the ability to make someone feel something through their writing makes their work more important than just a good story. Tone is what allows authors' minds and personality to shine through the pages of work, which is a good thing because it can help bring your audience closer to you and your creations. However, the tone is also used to express the opinion of authors on serious issues, such as their favorite and least favorite colors, but we welcome those brave men and women who share their favorite colors in this harsh and judgmental world. This tone is conveyed through the choice of the word, the choice of the word can make a difference between sarcasm and sincerity. Lets have an example between the post-apocalyptic world and a new opportunity: Example 1: It's been 500 years since the bomb, and the creatures behind our decrepit walls are still hunting us at night. Agricultural farms have been trampled up many times, the haul becomes and less every year, I'm afraid that if we don't move we will all suffer. Example 2: From the very beginning it is 500 years, and things that live outside of us continue to be misunderstood. Agricultural use has been hit hard this year, it seems that we may have to move forward and find new opportunities before we give up inevitably. The thing that makes the author try to express his feelings in these examples is the world around their characters, and in example 1 the author shows a more pessimistic view of the world, and the second example shows a more optimistic view, and the difference usually depends on the words used, so remember the power of words. This can also be compared to how tone ties to the topic, the theme and tone is how the author feels about this topic, to see it's pretty simple, the hardest part seems to be just a word choice, but it just needs editing and practice that you can get in our Weekly Writing Prompts (*cricket noise*oh come on that was smooth!). The tone can also be expressed through your character dialogue and thoughts, but be aware that your not jeopardizing beliefs that you previously set up with this character to get through a certain tone for good, it seems forced and can throw the reader out of your story. Also remember that the tone can be expressed through basically every emotion that you, as a human being, can wear out, which really puts us at a disadvantage to see how we don't have emotions, but we still power through, perhaps one day our robotic heart will find a way to imitate emotions, maybe... Mood Mood is what the author uses to help manipulate your emotions... Oh wait, that sounds wrong, not what we mean, that mood can cause certain emotions or vibes that create the right atmosphere to get the reader more invested in their story, hopefully that cleared some things. The mood can be created in several ways, the most important of which we will go to. The first one we should get out of the way is the mood-building too much, and I hope you should already understand what the tone is, but be aware that your opinion and choice of word can also change the reader's shift. If you're trying to get through a dramatic mood, but your tone looks more humorous, then the desired effect will probably be reduced, so make sure you're using things at the right time and place. Another way you can convey the idea of mood is the setting and how you describe it. It works the same way as walking into a dirty room it feels different than clean, so when the character walks into the cemetery, you can not expect your reader to feel that it is time for a party. So be careful when you're putting your characters in an attempt to create a specific mood, you can do this by setting the previous ones to help build the basis of this emotion pay it later and allow emotions to hit harder, or it can be done in an internal monologue, as the character feels in a certain place. The determination also relates to another thing we want to talk about, which is weather conditions, or from a secular point of view. There is a reason that people use a dark and stormy night, and it is not laziness (although it is a factor), it is because of the mood it finds, darkness and cloud thundering creates a entrenched sense of anxiety about what will come. The main rule is that the sunnier it is, the lighter the mood, and the darker it is in a darker mood, so trying to convey somewhere between you could show that it is cloudy or cloudy, making the sky grayer. Rain also shows the difference between a happy sprinkle and a depressing downpour. It is also not just our weather conditions, things like stars and moons, just things that really comfort people at night, so if you remove these things, you end up creating a restless environment. But in order to finish, the most important thing is to remember the choice of words, which plays a difficult role in both tone and mood as to how it changes everything. The theme theme is a tone theme, no negative back or positive back without mood and tone. In literature there are two types of themes, the main ones that go through the whole story, and the sidebars that appear only here and there. It would be good to note that the theme does not always have to be as serious as your favorite color from the pencil box, it can be simple things that really do not have much effect on real life, but a smaller theme does not harm the story as long as it is well written and well read. However, this does not mean that having an important theme in your book automatically becomes literary gold, in fact, if your subject is not conveyed correctly and likely it will look tacked and lazy, which, if you didn't know, makes a bad book. The safest bet is to go subtly and not have your book just outright specify what's right and wrong, and instead let your reader think for themselves. Just telling people what you think is right and wrong can alienate an entire group of people you don't want to do to see how this group could have been filled with potential customers. Going Blue is the best and purple sucks! is much worse than the intertwined tone and mood smoothly in your story to help guide your reader along and make specific decisions, it even makes a more compelling story. Often the genre type of your writing can affect the subject of your story, it is mainly applied to dystopia and post-apocalyptic genres that deal with how terrible things happened, be it pollution or greed. However, topics can be found in almost any Finding tone, mood, and theme is a very important story telling how they add emotion and depth to level stories that allow audiences to interact more closely with them. Hopefully you find something useful here, if not we still thank you for reading through anyway, have a good time day or night, and can't wait to read what you write. We've connected some of the links we used to explore these topics, as well as helping you deal with these things a little better. These links also contain some examples to look at. Check 'em out.
