Love it or hate it, there are a few simple Facebook etiquette tips that can make your experience more enjoyable. Wired magazine How Wiki shares several guidelines, including: One should not work with each other with whom they have no connection or connection to what matter. It makes you what I would call a vine. Poke with moderation and caution (I firmly adhere to this principle of etiquette). Talking to someone you happen to be facebook stalking, try to pretend you don't know everything about them. Avoid comments like: So, I saw you and Mike broke up on facebook... What would you add to this list? Please share in the comments. Minneapolis Star-Tribune's Matt Krumry offers some tips and tactics to improve workplace etiquette. Some ideas are quite commonplace, but others I was guilty of myself. Some good fodder for improving teamwork. Don't hold meetings in the cube Avoid noisy screensavers, or install email on a line of your favorite song every time a message appears in your inbox I'd counter that use the sound in order until only you can hear it. I often listen to music at work, but with volume down and without headphones, it doesn't shimmer in other people's spaces. Do not use the Agree 110% loudspeaker if you are in a closed office or boardroom. Also, be especially sure not to check the speaker's voicemail on the phone; few things are less annoying. Watch personal calls Avoid the strong smells cubicle decorations Krumry continues: Of course, family photos are great, but beware of posting material that may have sexual, political, racial or personally offensive messages. Of course I do. Keep the radio low See the second element above. Don't be that guy in the office space. ShutterstockY don't have to sport designer clothes to act like a royal. According to Emily Dulles, who has more than 29 years of experience in traditional etiquette, you should take a tip from the royal family and just dress up for the job you not the job you have. It would behoove our society to rise up on this occasion and dress more appropriately for work settings as well as social outings, says Dulles. So keep your workout clothes for the gym and your sneakers like While most people live in a more laid-back world, dressing appropriately for special occasions and events is important because it shows respect for themselves and others, according to Bonnie Cai, founder and director of Beyond Etiquette. The queen and her family all follow these specific royal family dress codes, too. Mark Greenwood/IPS/ShutterstockWhen Princess Diana got out of the car, she used her purse to cover her cleavage from the paparazzi. Average people don't have to worry about embarrassing photo op paparazzi, but it's still a good idea to sport above the cleavage in work and social settings. Keeping her cleavage in check and covered is a sure sign of a lady-like behavior, Says Dulles. That's why this is one of the rules of royal family etiquette that they are obliged to follow. Alan Davidson/ShutterstockY won't see the royal ladies crossing their legs on their knees. Instead, they usually cross at the ankle to form a Duchess tilt. Other nicknames include Sussex Slant, Cambridge Cross, and Spencer Tilt, but this position always requires keeping knees and ankles together, according to Tsai. Not only does this prevent any setbacks from happening, but it also helps lengthen the legs, tsai says. If you want to shoot for the stars and completely imitate the royal family, check the etiquette rules everyone in the royal family should follow. Tim Rooke /ShutterstockBright or dark color nail polish is fun for parties and weekend events. Dulles suggests doing as members of the royal family do, however, and wearing nude polish in public. This rule is one that more women should follow as he leaves his hands to look elegant and allows his team to focus on the task rather than her hands, Says Dulles. It also helps that nude polish is more forgiving wear than bright tones. Nothing says tacky and untidy, like a chipped nail, or worse, ten chipped nails. ShutterstockDulles notes that the hemlines go up and down for decades, and while short skirts can literally and figuratively be in Vogue, it doesn't mean it's a good idea to wear everywhere. The queen prefers skirts and knee-length mini-variety dresses, but you should choose a hem based on how comfortable you feel. Not only will you look better, but you'll also feel great knowing that your clothes will fit your body and be suitable for work meetings and most social outings, says Dulles. The work also has something to do with why Kate Middleton and Prince William rarely show PDA. ShutterstockThere has quite a few words that you will never hear the royal family say. They always speak so eloquently and with purpose. It's hard to do it in everyday small talk, but there's something folk can take away from this rule, choose your words wisely. The choice of words was directly related to the social class class United Kingdom, Says Dulles. Today I would say that the choice of words is very proportional to the class that a person has or lacks. Yes, this advice includes the use of the curse of the word sparingly, but none of them is not a single word queen Elizabeth considers vulgar. Tim Rooke/ShutterstockAmericans is usually eaten with zigzag style-cutting and holding food on both sides and switching to eat. Try to do as royals do and have a continental style, Tsai suggests. The next time you dine, you can try to elevate your dining style using a continental style of dining, where utensils never change hands, she says. This will make you appear more polished, since you don't need to change the dishes from hand to hand constantly. This advice especially comes to hand for those going to fancy gala concerts or weddings. It's also one of 10 rules of royal wedding etiquette every member of the royal family follows, too. TOBY MELVILLE/POOL/EPA-EFE/Shutterstock Don't worry about explaining yourself to others when you need to leave the table. Saying a simple apology is more than enough, according to Tsai. People can usually assume that we justify ourselves to go use the toilet, she says. You don't need to share your bathroom details at the dinner table or with other diners. ImageBROKER/Shutterstock The Royal Family has a pretty clever hack to keep your face and clothes clean while eating. The folding napkins in half with the crease in front of you actually allow you to smear, rather than wipe, your mouth on the inside of the napkin, says Tsai. This keeps the food stains on the inside of the napkins with the outside clear and present. Your handshake makes a lasting impression, so why not shake like a royal? Here's how: Maintain eye contact, take their hand firmly, but not hard, and shake for one or two pumps. If you have a sluggish handshake, people may assume you are unselfish, or have a lack of trust, says Tsai. If you shake too firmly, people may think that you are trying to overcompensate for something. Keep this in mind for your next meeting and greeting, but that's exactly what to do if you meet a member of the royal family. When a family member or friend is in the hospital, he can often cheer her up to see that you are ready to take time out of your day to visit. Before you go, brush up on the rules of etiquette in a place where there are sick and injured people. Know the hospital's rules. Most hospitals have their own visitation rules placed in or near the main lobby. Before visit your friend or family member, read them. Don't go if you're sick. Stay at home if you have one cough, or any other signs of illness. You don't need to spread your germs in a hospital where people's immune system is weak. Be clean. Wash your hands before and after visiting your friend or family member. You don't want to take germs in or out of the hospital. Set a time limit. You do not need to stay for a few hours unless you are a spouse, parent or child patient. Most of the time, 15 or 20 minutes is enough time to allow. Don't stay too long, or you can interfere with a person's need for rest. Keep it confidential. The patient must waive the confidentiality of medical personnel, but this does not apply to others. Before entering the room, knock and enter after you are invited. Follow the rules of personal space while in the room. Don't touch the equipment. Keep your hands handy from all medical equipment. This includes pipes, monitors, and an actual machine. It's never normal to reset anything. Keep the noise down. The hospital is not a good place for loud voices, booming laughter, or ringing cell phones. Put your mobile phone on silent or vibrate and plan to visit in a quiet tone. Let the family go first. If the hospital policy says that only so many people are allowed into the room at the same time, family members should go first. After all, it's not a party. Avoid the fragrance. Do not wear perfume or heavily scented toiletries to the hospital. Some patients may be allergic, or worse, be on ventilators. Stay positive. When you arrive at the hospital, be as positive as you can and smile if appropriate. Do not share negative past experiences in the hospital, or you may scare your friend or family member who is in the hospital. Don't go empty-handed. Bring a card, gift or bouquet to the patient to cheer up the patient. Leaving something for a person to enjoy later can help maintain her mood after all the visitors are gone. Keep your opinion to yourself. Avoid wanting to diagnose a patient if you are not a doctor. Aunt Sadie may have had similar symptoms, but this is not the time to share them with the person in the hospital bed. Never tell a person how bad it looks and if you are shocked by the pipes and beeps, don't show it. Keep the conversation easy. Before visiting a patient, think of a few conversation snacks to help prevent letting the conversation get too intense. Avoid discussing business, politics or anything that may interfere with a patient's recovery. Things you can talk about brighten up a patient's day include weather, anecdotes about work that aren't stressful, and something embarrassing that's funny. Be attentive to about the room. If your friend or family member is in a semi-private room, take into account the privacy of another person and the need for rest. Keep your voice down and don't turn on the TV without asking if it will bother him or her. Remember that people are human beings still hear when their eyes are closed. Whether a person is in a coma or just resting, don't say anything you wouldn't say if she was looking at you. She can hear you. Don't sit on the bed. If the patient doesn't ask you to sit next to him, don't sit on the bed. Most hospital wards have at least one chair, so use it if you need to sit. If not, you can ask for a chair, or you can stay standing. Honor of medical professionals. The patient is in the hospital for treatment, so honor them when they need treatment. When the doctor or nurse comes, offer to leave. Then leave the room with a positive attitude and either wait at the door or in the waiting room. Before you leave the patient's ward, it is always a good idea to thank the people in the honey shop. Make sure you choose a gift that is allowed in the hospital. If you are looking for some ideas, most hospital stores have different items. Here are some things you might want to consider about bringing a cheering person: Beams balloonsBooks (print or audio) MagazinesWord search and other games that can be played in a semi-lying positionpotted plant No one expects you to be the usual cheerful yourself when you're a patient in the hospital. However, you still have to cooperate with the medical staff and do everything possible to participate in your healing. If you don't want to smile, don't smile. Doctors, nurses and therapists understand. Let your guests know when you're ready to leave. This is the one time it is acceptable to show your guests the door.
