In this regard, do you remember those small convex screens that could only display monochrome text lines? Weren't they awesome? If you're a fan of the original Alien, or played in the more recent Alien: Isolation video game, then you're you That's what I'm talking about. Having a talking screen with a console display is the dream of any seventies sci-fi buff. Now you too can live that dream ... Sort of. J.A.R.V.I.S. - The Digital Life Assistant sounds very bombastic, but essentially comes down to a console that interprets written or voice commands similar to a Windows command console. The distinctive feature is that it speaks to you. Unfortunately, you can't participate in the conversation, it's not a bot. No AI here, I'm afraid... What you can do is enter specific commands, such as lock the screen or turn off the monitor, return the time and date along with other slightly less useful features. However, there seem to be some features that deal with weather forecast and news, although unfortunately they don't really work. As with the software of the eighties, J.A.R.V.I.S looks like it's a few decades old. Features Of the Console Command Voice Team Audio Feedback Some access to system features Pros It can entertain you for a few minutes, or it can become a permanent addition if you want to lock your computer by talking to it. Cons We couldn't use any advanced features such as weather or news search. So much for compatibility. Conclusion I can not declare J.A.R.V.I.S as bloatware. It's not big and doesn't come along with some other apps. So I think it's in its class ... Own...
