Dec 20, 2016 Getty Images Top talent reveal their ideas for hosting memorable holiday parties. 1 of the 5 Co-founders of the prestigious event design planning and production company New York Fête (with husband, Josh Brooks), Jung Lee is known for his elegant and refined aesthetic. His impossible tip to eat with polish? Go the buffet road. Food stations are easy and interactive for family and friends, and when served the right way, can actually make things feel more sophisticated, he says. Lee recommends improving dishes with decorative serving utensils, and choosing colorful foods. 1 like to turn the bowl to use it as a base for the plate, or use a cake and pie stand, he said. Food should be a star, so focus on ingredients that have color. Then stick to the all-white porcelain that serves the pieces so that the food stands out. 2 of 5 There's a reason why Hollywood celebrities (like Ellen DeGeneres and Gwen Stefani) come to Beverly Hills-based Mindy Weiss for their high-stakes show: She has a knack for romantic atmosphere with a classic twist. To get the same soft focus effect, Weiss defines one important element. No matter what kind of celebration, lighting makes all the difference, he says. Weiss uses classic white merunas candles for a lasting feeling — but adds that any size or type will work. He also points out that flattering lighting is worth it in close-ups. Polaroid cameras are a fun and inexpensive way to document nights, he said. 3 of 5 Actress Emma Stone and fashion designer Jenni Kayne went to LA-based Annie Campbell for intimate and thoughtfully executed soirées; Campbell often draws from his own family rituals to add a personal touch with a modern twist. Growing up, my mother always served Old Fashioned cocktails for holiday parties - she would say that the first round was on her, and then set up a bar where guests could help themselves for the rest of the night, she said. To update the tradition, Campbell suggested a fully self-service model, which helped her to focus on her guests rather than their glasses: My husband pre-batch pitchers of Old Fashioneds with Fee Brother's Cherry Bitters. 4 out of 5 Will and Jada Smith, Madonna, Bill Clinton and Arianna Huffington register Lulu Powers-based Los Angeles to party with glamour and panache. But Powers' tip for a memorable table doesn't require a blockbuster budget: I've always liked the fruit on the table - it adds a layered look, he says. Red pomegranates make everything come alive, and pears or green apples can be used to hold a hold 5 out of 5 Camille Styles, the mastermind behind her beloved lifestyle blog and event planning brand, suggests a nostalgic diversion to decorative effects and an early party atmosphere: Prepare a stack of board games, cards and dominoes for some classic fun that will keep guests of all ages completely entertained, she advises. For this Christmas Day celebration, I trolled eBay for vintage boxes of Monopoly, Scrabble and Trivial Pursuit – much more captivating than the shiny and new version. Holiday parties are expensive and a waste of time. I know this because I've been to, and hosted, countless. One hundred years ago I attended a holiday party thrown by the Big 4 (actually it was the Big 6 at the time) the accounting firm where I worked. The company actually owns three of these parties - one for the main office and a smaller one for their two satellite offices in the area - and my boss strongly encouraged me to go to all of them. I also attended a holiday party thrown by a corporate client. When I left the company after almost nine years I attended several holiday parties at the publicly held biopharmaceutical company where I worked. Then when I went there to start my own business, I kept going to parties at clients and, reluctantly, started holding annual holiday events (it was lunch or dinner) for my people. Related: To Host the Best Holiday Party Share Bonus and Go HomeSo look back I've been to big gala parties, smaller affairs, events in the office, soirees at home, lunch and dinner all associated with some sort of corporate holiday celebration. And you know what? None of them are worth it. Why? For starters, no one really wants to be there. We worked with these people all day and now we're forced to see them after work? For me, if I wanted to hang out with fellow workers, I would do it on my own time. Couples and others who are significant - if invited - certainly don't want to be there either. They don't know anyone and will soon become suspicious of handsome co-workers they've never heard you mention before but welcome you just a little too warmly. Food OK and everyone loves the open bar. But then there are those who just can't hold it together. They say or do career-ending things they will never have in a professional environment. And don't forget the enormous risk of responsibility if someone who has been drinking at your party got into the car and accidentally ran over the puppy - or or Aware of the Risks of Mixing Work and BoozeOh, and then there's the cost. Some big corporations spend hundreds of thousands of dollars on their holiday parties. Smaller companies like mine cough up less, but still have to make significant outlays for smaller businesses. For some unknown reason, we host events downtown where employees have to fight traffic, pay for parking or transit and then - ironically - step over the homeless or people in need on the streets on their way to consume large amounts of shrimp and vodka cocktails. What if all of us business owners and executives at medium and large corporations across the country agreed not to have holiday parties and instead donate the money we would spend to buy food and housing for homeless and needy people? Or buy textbooks for local schoolchildren? Or given to charities that help the underprivileged wouldn't be that much more in line with the seasons? Related: Corporate Charity Is What Inspires Greater Employee Engagement But it doesn't, instead Corporate America - and that includes you, me and millions of other small businesses - is wasting money on an event that enjoys little and provides no long-term benefit other than a funny story about Jake in accounting and how everyone at the company finds out at the same time that he has a big fly at the bottom of it. So what's the alternative? Here are some things I'm considering. I thought I'd write a personal thank you note to the individual. I might raise the bonus a little bit. I will definitely send chocolates to certain key customers as a thank you. I would probably hand out some gift cards to a select few and tell them that instead of being forced to go through the agony of an office party why not instead have a nice dinner with another significant one on me. I plan to give one or two extra days off in December (or maybe even January) so people can have a little extra time to spend with their families. I would definitely take the money I saved by not throwing the party and instead donate it to a local fundraiser for a sick friend I know. All these things I considered this year. To me, they mean more than just stupid holiday parties. No one's going to stop because I'm not having a holiday party. Some may become more loyal. 31 Quick and Easy Mexican Inspired Lunch Recipes Quick and easy recipes for a light pasta dinner. It's celiac dinner party heaven!
