No one can challenge her right to come; the house had been her husband since the death of her father; but the indelicacy of her demeanor was so great, and for a woman in Mrs. Dashwood's situation, only with general feelings, must have been very unweithed; - but in her mind there was a sense of honor so acutely, generosity so romantic that any crime of sorts, whoever was given or received, was for her a source of immovable disgust. Mrs. John Dashwood has never been a favorite with any of her husband's family; but she hasn't had the opportunity, until now, of shewing them with how little attention to other people's comfort, she can act when required. So keenly did Mrs. Dashwood feel this ungrateful demeanor, and so earnestly she despises her daughter-in-law for it, that, upon the latter's arrival, she would have left the house forever without her eldest girl prompted her first to reflect on the propriety of going, and her own own love for all her three children determined her to stay, and for them to avoid breaking with their brother.
