Copyright © 2020 InSpace Holdings, L.L.C., a System1 Company Is there a bubble that is bubbling up in the tech world? Several journalists here have raised the question repeatedly over the past few months in our editorial meeting. We didn't assign articles. Why? Bubbles are an expected part of our market system (there's always a bubble somewhere). Entrepreneurs look at the possibilities, and investors are racing to fund them. Many of these businesses fail, and a lot of money is lost. Our aim at Fast Company is not to chronicle this ongoing revival and fall but to try to lead our readers through the tumult, to see the huge change of picture, long term that emerges from this noisy, neat, creative process. We are aware that speculation about bubbles is a staple of other media. But where else can you read about Second High in Beijing and how the gaokao, China's college admissions exam, is determining the next generation of Chinese leaders? About Harold Vinegar's quixotic efforts to make Israel a powerhouse of power through genuine gas innovation? At the same time, history has shown that even in the wake of the worst bubble collapse, great new ideas and businesses emerge. Receiving this unrest was part of a creative and productive life in the 21st century. Company-and-those-who-succeed now are the best ones can adapt to this constant flux. Fast Company is dedicated to ensuring you keep track of exciting new developments that are truly important, regardless of market conditions. In summary, this kind of dynamism and eclecticism is nothing more than a reflection of the modern world of business. Business.
