Becoming human documentary answer key

Rodman and Henry McHenry, both at the University of California, Davis, point out that hominids evolved to walk straight in response to climate change. When the forest shrunk, the hominid ancestors found themselves descending from trees to walk across the grasslands that separated the forest patches. The most effective way to walk on the ground is bipedally, Rodman and McHenry argue (full disclosure: Rodman is my graduate mentor). In 2007, researchers studying chimpanzees on a treadmill determined that chimpanzees needed more than 75 percent more energy while walking over two-legged humans, providing some evidence that bipedalism has many other advantages. Both ideas were debunked by the fact that the first hominids lived in at least some wild habitat. Although difficult to study, the question of why evolutionary bipedalism may come close to answering if paleoanthropologists dig more fossils of the oldest hominids that lived seven million to six million years ago. Who knows how many species of monkeys will know how many species of monkeys will be found, but each new discovery has the potential to change the way we understand the origins of one of our most distinctive traits.
