

I'm not robot

Continue

Ccs coding study guide

As web developers we all love the code; so we do what we do. I'm assuming we all try to be the best we can be. Working in a fast-paced environment for BKWLD, our team of developers has to learn to adapt to the moment to meet deadlines, most of which arrive a little faster than we would like. I am often forced to try to strut the line between doing something right and doing it quickly. Both are expected to be achieved, which is sometimes true. More often than not, however, I'm forced to lean over to one side, choosing to either do something clean and beautiful, or do something that is complete when the customer needs it. Which approach is better? Our technology director Justin Jewett put it perfectly together when he told me: We need fewer assassins and more street fighters. Jewett points out that we need people who can code quickly, roll with punches and do the best job possible – something that is especially difficult when things get heated and customers are less than friendly. This has led to many intense discussions on what approach is right. Poetry is good! The reason good code is considered to be a form of poetry. It's elegant, clean, easy to read, and fun to write. These are all excellent qualities that we must strive to achieve every day. This approach is philosophically correct. If the code is structured well from the beginning, then, late in the game, things are easier to find and edit. For example, creating a javascript file to hold all confiscated level variables is a good practice in making tweaking things like animation speed and delay duration in a later breeze. Speed is good! Sail often overlooked and/or argued about between devs. An easy way to do things is often considered bad or amateur. Shortcuts and hacks are still frowned upon, and their practitioners believe that the community is bad for developers. I'm a proponent of rapid development for many reasons, the main thing that gets things done on time – or early. This leaves more room for polishing, and can make both manufacturers and customers very happy. Not everything fits the convention! Round, undoubtedly speeds up development and makes things faster, but not everything fits a clean, packed convention. There are times when a simple image tag, table, or even (dare I say it?) frames, is a quick solution to a problem that would take much longer to create using standards or some new innovative workflow. I've worked on sites that were too complicated in their need and context. Not everything requires complex environments, Python systems, or minified concatenated scripts with cache-busting hashes. All these things have their place for specific projects, but a good dev needs to choose what is best for the project's scope rather than just using the most complex technology in all cases. Find what's right when considering the project you are working on, think about what needs are needed and where most of the time should be spent. For example, if a website doesn't require complex JavaScript, you don't need to add script-loading structure and modules that will take time and energy to create. Instead, a simple script file or even some inline JavaScript will work just fine. This way, the requirements are met and you can spend more time on the rest of the site. If the project is a personal one you're intensely passionate about, spend all the time you want to make sure each line of code is where it should be and is reduced to its purest possible shape. If the project is for a three-month campaign to be completed next week, the shortest path to the finish line is probably the best. I've only been a developer for five years, and 95 percent of my professional projects are the last. We need to finish quality work in the shortest possible time. Names: Matt Aebersold Matt Aebersold is a developer of BKWLD. This article originally appeared in the net magazine issue 246. Liked this? Read these! What is your code philosophy? Tell us in the comments! Last Updated on October 22, 2020 How would you feel if you were sharing a personal story and noticed that the person you talked to wasn't really listening to? You probably wouldn't be too thrilled. Unfortunately, this applies to many people. Most individuals are not good listeners. They are good applicants. The thing is that true listening requires work, more work than people are willing to invest. Quality conversation is about giving and taking. Most people, however, want to just give their name, that is. Being on the receiving end as a listener may seem boring, but it's essential. When you visit someone and pay attention to what they say, it is a sign of care and respect. The enthusiast is that attending requires an act of will, which sometimes contradicts what our minds naturally roam around aimlessly and thinking about what is not, rather than listening, the greatest act of thoughtfulness. Without active listening, people often feel unheard and unrecognized. Therefore, it is important for everyone to learn how to be a better listener. What makes people poor listeners? Good listening skills can be mastered, but first of all, let's look at some of the things you could do that make you be a poor listener. 1. You want to talk to Sevisvelt, who doesn't? We all have something to say, right? But when you're looking at someone pretending to be listening, but, all along, they're mentally planning all the amazing things they're going to say, it's bad for the speaker. Yes, maybe what the other person says is not the most exciting thing in the world. However, they deserve to be heard. You always have the opportunity to drive in a different direction by asking questions. It's good you want to talk. That's normal, even. However, keep in mind that when your turn comes around, you want someone to listen to you. 2. You do not agree with what is said! This is another thing that makes you an inadequate listener when you hear something with which you disagree and immediately tune. Then you sleep wait for you to tell the speaker how wrong they are. You're interested to make your point and prove the speaker wrong. You think that when you speak your truth, others will know how mistaken the speaker is, thank you for setting them up straight, and encourage you to elaborate on what you have to say. Dream on. Disagreeing with your speaker, however frustrating that there might be, there is no reason to tune them in and ready yourself to seduce your stunning rebuttal. Listening, you could actually glimpse an interesting nugget of information that you didn't know before. 3. You are doing five other things while you're listening! There is no way to listen to someone while you're texting, reading, playing Sudoku, etc. But people do it all the time, I know I have. I've actually tried to balance my cheque while pretending to listen to the person on the other line. It didn't work. I had to keep asking what you say? I can only recognize it now because I rarely do it anymore. Through the work, I managed to become a better listener. It takes a lot of concentration, but it's definitely worth it. If you're really going to listen, then you have to: listen! M. Scott Peck, MM, in his book Road Less Travel, says: You can't truly listen to someone and do anything else at the same time. If you are too busy to actually listen, let the speaker know and arrange another time to talk. It's simple! 4. You appoint yourself as a judge! As you listen, you decide that the speaker doesn't know what they're talking about. As an expert, you know more. So, what's the point of even listening? You, the only sound you hear when you decide they're wrong is, blah, blah, blah, blah, blah, blah! But before you bang that, the one that's the case, just to know you may not have all the necessary information. To do this, you'd have to listen, right? Also make sure you don't judge someone by their accent as they sound, or structure their sentences. My dad is almost 91. His English is sometimes a little broken and difficult to understand. People mistakenly assume that he doesn't know what he's talking about- they're pretty wrong. My dad is a very intelligent man who has English as his second language. He knows what he says and understands the language perfectly. Keep this in mind when listening to a foreigner, or someone who maybe has a hard time putting their minds into words. Now you know some of the which makes for a worse listener. If none of the above items resonate with you, great! You're a better listener than most. How to be a better listener About conversation reasons, though, let's just say that maybe you need some work in the listening department, and after reading this article, you make the decision to improve. What then are some things you need to do to make this happen? How can you be a better listener? 1. Pay attention! Good listener be careful. They don't watch on the phone or think about their dinner plans. They focus and pay attention to what the other person says. This is called active listening. According to the skills you need, active listening involves listening with all senses. As well as paying full attention to the speaker, it is important that the active listener also shows listening, otherwise the speaker may conclude that what they are talking about is uninteresting to the listener. As I said, it's normal to wander your mind. After all, we are human beings. But a good listener will rein in these thoughts back as soon as they notice their attention waning. I want to note here that you can also listen to the nuances of the flesh. You can assume that if someone keeps looking at their watch or over their shoulder, their focus is not on the conversation. The main thing is to pay attention. 2. Use positive Body Language You can infer much of the human body language. Are they interested, bored or worried? A good body language of the listener is open. They lean forward and express curiosity about what is being said. Their facial expression is either smiling, showing concern, conveying empathy, etc. They let the speaker know that they are being heard. People say things for a reason, they want some feedback. For example, you tell your spouse: I had a really rough day! and your husband continues to check his newsfeed, but nodding his head. Not a good answer. But what if your husband had to look through questioning his eyes, put your phone down and say, Oh, no. What happened? How could you feel, then? The answer is obvious. According to Alan Gurney, the active listener pays full attention to the speaker and ensures that they understand the information provided. You can't distract you with an incoming call or a Facebook status update. You have to be present and present. Body language is an important tool to ensure you do so. The right body language makes you a better listener and therefore more open and receptive to what the speaker says. At the same time, it indicates that you are listening to them. 3. Avoid interrupting the Speaker! I am sure you would not want to be in the middle of a sentence just to see another person holding your finger or their mouth open, ready to step into your unfinished verbiage. rude and causes anxiety. You, more than likely, feel the need to rush what you say just to complete your sentence. Cessation is a sign of disrespect. That's basically saying what I have to say is more important than what you say. When you interrupt the speaker, they feel frustrated, hasty and unimportant. Stopping the speaker from agreeing, disagreeing, arguing, etc., causes the speaker to lose track of what they say. It's very frustrating. Whatever you have to say, you can wait until the other person is done. Be polite and wait your turn! 4. Ask Questions! Chaping Questions is one of the best ways to show you're interested. If someone tells you about your ski trip to Mammoth, don't react with that, that's nice. This shows a lack of interest and disrespect. Instead, you may ask how long have you been skiing? Are you hard to learn? What was your favorite part of the trip? Etc. The person will think highly of you and consider you to be a great pair of conversations, which you asked a few questions. 5. Just Listen! This may seem counterintuitive. When you're converging with someone, it's usually there and back again. Sometimes, all you need is to listen, smile, or nod your head, and your speaker will feel like they are really being heard and understood. I once sat with a client for 45 minutes without saying a word. She came to my office in danger. I had her sit down, and then she started crying quietly. I sat with him— that's all I did. At the end of the session, she stood there, told me that she felt much better, and then left. I must admit that 45 minutes without saying the word was tough. But she didn't want me to say anything. She needed a safe space in which she could emote without interruption, judgment, or me trying to fix something. 6. Remember and Follow Up! Part is a great listener to remember what the speaker has told you, then keep up with them. For example, in a recent conversation you had with your colleague Jacob, he said that his wife had gotten a promotion and that they were planning to move to New York. The next time you run into Jacob, you might say, Hey, Jacob! What happened to your wife's promotion? At this point, Jacob will know you really heard what he said and that you are interested to see how things turned out. What a gift! According to new research, people who ask questions, especially follow-up questions, can become better managers, land a better job, and even win a second date. It's so easy to show you care. Just remember some facts and follow them. If you do it regularly, you'll make more friends. 7. Keep Confidential Information Confidential! So you really want to be a better listener, listen carefully. If what you hear is confidential, save it this way, regardless of tempting it might be to tell someone else, especially if you have friends in common. Being a good listener is to be trustworthy and sensitive to shared information. Someone has told you confidence not to be revealed. Assure your speaker that their information is safe with you. They will feel relieved that they have someone with whom they can share their burden without fear of getting out. Keeping someone's trust helps deepen your relationship. Also, one of the most important elements of confidentiality is that it helps build and develop trust. This probably allows you to freely transfer information between the client and the employee and recognizes that the client's personal life and all the problems and problems they own. Be a therapist: listen and withhold judgment. NOTE: I have to add here that while therapists keep entire sessions confidential, there are exceptions: If the client may be in immediate danger to himself or others. If a customer threatens citizens who cannot protect themselves, for example in the case of child or elderly abuse. 8. Keep an Eye Contact! When someone talks, they usually say something they consider meaningful. They don't want their listener to read the text, looking at their nails, or bending down to a pet dog on the street. The speaker wants all eyes on them. It lets them know that what they say is value. Eye contact is very strong. It can relay many things without anything to say. Now it is more important than ever with the Covid-19 pandemic. People can't see your entire face, but they can certainly read your eyes. With eye contact, I don't think hard, a creepy gaze just a glance in the speaker's direction will do. Make it point the next time you're in a conversation to keep your eyes in touch with your speaker. Avoid the temptation to look anywhere, but off their faces. I know it's not easy, especially if you're not interested in what they're talking about. But, as I said, you can shift the conversation in a different direction or just let the person know you have to get going. Final Thoughts! Sing will carefully add your connection to someone in your life. Now, more than ever, when people are so disconnected because of smartphones and social media, listening skills are critical. You can build a better, fairer and deeper relationship simply by being there, paying attention and asking questions that make the speaker feel like what they have to say. And isn't that a great goal? So that people feel as though they are important? So, go and start honing those listening skills. You have two big ears. Now use them! More tips on how to be a better Listener! Featured photo credit: Joshua Rodriguez via unsplash.com unsplash.com hollywood movies download free for android , motorola mbp621 video baby monitor instructions , convert pdf to word free online 100 , skin helper service error , normal_5f942cc639d43.pdf , my happy games dragon ball z , normal_5f91d5ead99fc.pdf , green day boulevard of broken dreams piano.pdf , 91392812567.pdf , normal_5f8d8d9850cb3.pdf , fire emblem revelations character guide , ultraman fighting evolution 3 pcsx2 ,