Did you know that in addition to English or Chinese, Spanish is one of the most spoken languages in the world? The great advantage of Spanish is the access it offers to a wide range of countries and cultures. It is the second largest spoken language in the world (after Mandarin Chinese), with 400 million native languages, and official status in 21 staggering countries spreading throughout South, Central and North America as well as in Africa and Europe. Not only is Spanish spoken in Spain: South America and Central America have millions of Hispanics. In Mexico alone, there are 121 million people who dominate Spanish. In addition to countries such as the United States, where about 41 million natives and 11.6 are bilingual (more than Spain itself) speak Spanish alone. Translations, therefore, are carried out from English to Spanish, for a number of reasons: from manufacturers of medical devices, and to testing editors for law firms. More Spanish now from what it has ever been . But with languages like Mandarin, Arabic and Japanese, will Spanish lose some of its popular charm? Certainly not, like a romantic language, that shares roots with English, rather than pointing to its close relationship with France. While linguists and entrepreneurs are drawn to the challenge of learning non-European languages, the familiarity of many aspects of Spanish means it is likely to attract a wider audience of language learning. Beyond practical concerns, opportunities offered by the Spanish language to explore a large number of cultures, as well as business facilities stemming from new Spanish-speaking markets, Spanish will surely continue to grow as a popular language for students and entrepreneurs around the world. From this Spanish English translator you can translate from English to 37 other languages, but translating from English to Spanish is one of the measures used in our online translator. Why is translation important in a world where English is everywhere? In a world where English is everywhere, is translation still important? Is it even necessary? English is the third largest spoken language in terms of native language, with at least 330 million people. But if you count people who speak it as a second language, it's the most popular language in the world. So why is translation so important? Here are 5 reasons why translation is important and will remain important, despite the growing possible English. English is the most spoken language, of course, but that doesn't mean you can ignore all the people who don't speak it. Even the UK is home to important populations of foreign and minority speakers. And just because a person can speak some English, that doesn't mean they can speak well enough to deal with all situations. For example, a 2012 European Commission poll found that only a quarter of Europeans were able to understand English well enough to follow a news program in that language. Maintaining a basic conversation is one thing: easy and effective communication is another. English is the most extensive spoken language. However, this is only if those who speak it as a second language are considered. And it lies in that problem. Almost without exception, people respond better to language than they grew up with. To sell effectively to people, speaking the language they understand is not enough (especially if their understanding is limited). You need to talk to them in the language that their heart speaks. A study by Common Sense Counseling, 75% of customers prefer to buy products in their native language. And a study by Indian market research firm JuxtConsult found that nearly three-quarters of Indian consumers prefer and search for content in their native language. There is a reason why demand for translation services is booming. While English is periodically crowned the language of global business, translation and interpretation remain as a vital part of doing business around the world. International growth remains the key to increasing revenues and profitability for companies, and will always seek to trade with overseas markets. Products launched outside the boundaries of origin must still comply with relevant packaging and labeling standards. And that means it still needs to be translated. English may already be at the top of the world, but that doesn't mean it will stay that way forever. Other languages are of growing importance as developing countries take their place in the world economy and more of their citizens have access to the Internet. For example, most of the world's web content was previously in English... That's no longer the case. And remember, even people who speak English as a second language in general prefer to read, see and buy in their first language. What is the number one reason why translation is so important? Ideas and information are allowed to be published in all cultures. In the process, translation changes the date. Examples: The Bible has been translated into at least 531 languages. No matter what you believe, the impact on history is undeniable. Translation helps sports teams and organizations overcome language barriers, and beyond international boundaries.
