Sub-total: Discount: Shipping: Tax: Order Total: Child Protective Services investigates reported incidents of child abuse or neglect and attempts to find adoptive homes for children who are unable to live with their biological parents. Each state has its own agency, but usually an investigation begins within 24 hours of a complaint and ends within 30 days. In 2003, 2.9 million complaints of child abuse or neglect were filed nationally, but it is estimated that the number actually tripled. About 57,450 children were adopted in the U.S. through publicly funded child welfare agencies in 2009. California, with 7,438 adopted children, topped the list, after Texas, adopted 4,976 children. The total number of children adopted in 2009 was 115,000, down from 135,000 in 2006. If allegations of children being abused or neglected are true, parents are unable or unwilling to take care of children properly, and children are removed from the house, child protective services asks the court to abolish parental rights and keep children up for adoption. In Michigan, more than 2,700 children were adopted in 2009, through the Michigan Department of Human Services and private adoption agencies, and there are currently nearly 5,300 children who are in foster care and whose parents have exhausted their parents' rights. The state of Georgia usually has hundreds of children who are waiting to be adopted, and it features a child or sibling group at 6:00 p.m News each Wednesday. Prospective parents must be aware that adoption through child protective services means they may have to deal with children suffering from physical, mental or emotional difficulties due to the neglect or abuse they have caused. On the other hand, there are various financial benefits available to help adoptive parents make it available for their special children and they may be eligible for tuition exemptions. Here's what to say and what to do. May 4, 2007 Jamie Duplass/Stock before he tell him to check out the atmosphere of the place whenever he applies for a job; He should pay attention to how employees are treated. Explain the difference between flirting (enjoyed by both parties) and harassment (unwelcome sexual comments or physical contact). Insist that he should tell you if someone makes him uncomfortable, you can talk about the best way to respond. Make sure she knows she can refuse an order that is not related to her job duties; for example Her supervisor can't force her to travel with her unless it's clearly part of the job. Ask him if he's working you can leave off; Her supervisors see you. Listen closely when your teens complain. Let's say something like, oh, the work is a drag. If you just answer, well, yes, work is always a drag, your teen might stop, explains psychologist Christine Nicholson, PhD. Keep talking instead. Find out why the work is a drag. If your daughter complains about a particular person or creep, ask her what's creepy about the man. What makes him uncomfortable about him? Be suspicious if a manager seems to favor his child, asking him to come in early or stay late because he is the best worker. Another danger sign: He pays attention to him in a way that has nothing to do with work, such as teaching him to drive. If your child is harassed at the job, talk to his manager immediately. If that person doesn't take the situation seriously, call the next high-up. Keep going up the chain. Write all the names, phone numbers, dates and times of your call. Check out these if you need to call back. or Send a letter (by certified mail). Stay on the case, even if your teen is uncomfortable. You need to make clear to her that it's not about her behavior, it's about the man, explains Bonnie Sanchez, a clinical counselor who runs the Albuquerque sex offender treatment program in New Mexico. Leave him if he's uncomfortable; Insists he would leave if he's really upset or you think the situation is risky. If your daughter is staying at work, make sure she understands that it's not good for the time being. Don't let him think he's overreacting, even if the harasser tries to say it was all in fun. Remind him that he is hardly a victim. If he's doing this to you, he's doing it to someone else, said a plaintiff in the Burger King case. His document is the behavior of the harasser. He should keep a notebook and write down everything that's said or done, when and where it took place, and if there were others present. Tell him to take a picture if he can (perhaps with a cell phone) of any physical evidence — say, a fringe where a towel was broken against him. Suggest he talks to other employees and find out what his experiences have been. You can also talk to their parents if you want. If you decide to sue, find a lawyer who has expertise in sexual harassment or employment-discrimination law. Do not delay-there is a deadline for admission to every state, some are 180 days less than the date of the previous incident. We are not perfect, and and We are extremely timid in finding ways to help us overdraft our bank accounts. Here's some information about overdraft fees and why you shouldn't use overdraft security services. Overdraft fee overdraft security was designed for a customer-friendly service that kept the customer from suffering from the momentary embarrassment of a decline in bounce cheque or debit card transactions. Banks will allow customers to spend money they didn't have for a small fee called overdraft fees. An overdraft fee is a fee charged by the bank when the purchase or withdrawal exceeds the balance available on the account. Overdraft fees used to be relatively modest but today they have become big business for banks. Banks absolutely like overdraft fees. They receive a significant amount of their income from overdraft fees. The U.S. banking industry collected nearly 40 billion dollars in overdraft fees in 2009. Overdraft fees are collected when checking accounts and credit cards. Banks will approve a transaction that will keep the customer over their account limit and then the customer will be hit with an additional fee. Every subsequent transaction is hit with an additional fee until the account balance is brought up-to-date. While overdraft fees are a bank's best friend, they are often a customer's worst nightmare. Bank horror stories overdraft horror stories are becoming commonplace. People will often speak of being charged $35 for a $4 purchase at McDonald's or a $35 fee for a $1.99 soft drink purchase. I've heard people's stories are being charged overdraft fees as $39 for each transaction. I was recently speaking with a friend of mys and he told me about his overdraft horror story with a financial institution. He had been a member of his bank for more than 8 years. His total remaining available was $760.00 on December 10. He wrote two cheques totaling $750.00 on December 10. One check was for $500.00 for a loan payment and the second check was for $250.00 for a utility bill payment. He did a poor job of keeping track of his balance and proceeded to use his debit card to buy gas, gum, coffee, and beverages earlier in the week. The bank approved the first two cheques despite being well written after debit card transactions and charged overdraft fees for all small account transactions. 11 debit card transactions were charged to them $35 each. Each transaction was for only a few dollars. Some of them were as small as two dollars. He's paying $385 for nearly $45 worth of transactions to finish. If the bank had just processed the payment in the order that they were receiving, his total fee would amount to $35. This trick is often used by big banks. They will change the order of delay in cheque clearing or deposit posting so that they can increase the total amount of overdraft fees. The method is the biggest check-first policy. Banks claim that they clear the largest transaction first so that a customer's mortgage or rent payment is not bounced. This is a total lie. They clear the largest transactions first so that all small transactions will overdraw the customer's account, and they can receive overdraft fees. If they previously approved small transactions, the bank would only be able to charge the customer a one-time fee of $35 for the largest transaction. By clearing the largest transactions first, they can receive a large amount of fee income. What can you do about overdraft fees? The good news is that you have the option to decline the overdraft loan program courtesy of your bank. All you have to do is call your bank and inform that you want to opt out of their overdraft program. By opting out you may suffer the embarrassment of purchasing a declined debit card, but it's much better than paying the fees associated with avoiding momentary embarrassment. Doing so means that you'll need to be more disciplined with balancing your checking account, logging in every debit card purchase and ensuring that your account has enough money at all times to clear important checks. If a cheque is not clear, you will be fined for a bounce cheque. Have you ever been charged an overdraft fee? Tell us your overdraft fee horror stories or your opinion on the subject.
